A Pension for a Mule has been Secured from the War Department by the intercession of General Sherman and other distinguished officers. The mule, which is quite white, is at the Mount Vernon Barracks, Ala., and was ordered to be sold. The officers at the post sent up a petition that the mule might be retained on account of its long service, and they offered to provide for its maintenance at their own expense. General Sherman submitted the petition to Secretary Lincoln with a recommendation, in which he said: "I have seen that mule; it is believed to have been at the post since 1820. The Quartermaster's Department will be chargeable with ingratitude if that mule be sold. I advise that it be kept in the department, fed, and maintained till death." The Secretary of War thereupon made the following order: "Let this mule be kept and well cared for as long as he lives." The ingratitude of governments is proverbial, but in this case the faithful services of the mule are to be recognized by provision for its comfort until death. Neither for man nor beast can the power of a government go farther. The humble servant of the Saviour, content if he be only a hewer of wood or a drawer of water, serves a king whose power extends beyond the grave and who will never forget his services (Rev. 22 : 12).

A Widow's Search for a Lost Boy Ended happily after three years' persevering effort a few days ago. The boy, who was the son of poor parents in England, was sent as an emigrant to Canada by a charitable organization. He was of a delicate constitution, and on being placed with a farmer the hardships of the life injured his health and he determined to get back to his home in England. His yearning for his mother was pitiable. At length he ran away and wandered about the country, seeking employment in the hope of saving money for his passage. He made his way to New York where he became a newsboy and afterward a telegraph messenger. Subsequently some benevolent friends sent him to an educational institute in Kentucky. A short time ago, looking at a Canadian newspaper belonging to a classmate, he saw by an advertisement that his widowed mother had crossed the Atlantic to seek him, and had been wearily searching in Canada and the United States for three years. His joy was unbounded, and procuring railroad fare from his teachers he travelled the next day to his mother's abode in Toronto. When the mother saw her long-lost boy she clasped him in her arms, and fainted with joy. It is when the seeker after God realizes that God has sent His Son to seek for him that light breaks upon his soul (Matt. 18 : 11).

A LOVING ENTREATY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Put me in remembrance: let us plead together: declare thou, that thou mayest be justified."—ISAIAH 43 : 26.

The Invitation—The Way of Salvation—I. A Humbling Challenge—The Charge—Neglect of Prayer—No Delight in God—Never Honor Him—Nor Love Him—Nor Obey Him—II. An Amended Version—How to Take Up the Challenge—Plead the Amnesty—The Published Declaration—Model Pleading—III. Practical Suggestions—Human Remembrance Refreshed—The Sin of Sins.

WE shall mainly dwell upon the first invitation of the text: "Put me in remembrance."

In this verse man is invited to draw near to God. Those same men of whom God saith that He was weary of them are bidden to plead with Him. "Thou hast made Me to serve with thy sins, thou hast wearied Me with thine iniquities;" and yet it is evident that in another sense the Lord was not weary of them, for He calls upon them to come to a conference with Him, saying, "Put me in remembrance; let us plead together." This approach to God is the way of our salvation. The first thing that must be done with some men is to make them think of God at all, and the best thing that can be done with any man is to draw him nearer and yet nearer to the great Father of spirits.

"It is good for me to draw near to God," said one who knew right well what he was speaking of; and every man who does not yet understand such an utterance will find it to be true if he will test it. Here is

A COMMANDMENT WITH PROMISE:

"Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you." Here is another, "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found, call ye upon Him while He is near; let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon." Nearness to God is evidently the hope of the seeker.

For the prodigal in the distant country the most essential thing was that he should arise and go unto his father. It would have been of little use for him to have washed himself from the filth of the swine-trough, or to have broken off his acquaintance with the citizens of that country; he could never be right while he dwelt so far from his father's house. The most sober and secluded life in the far country would not have satisfied the cravings of his heart, any more than the husks would have filled his belly; true, it would have been some improvement upon spending his living riotously, but it would have wrought no change in his soul, and given no rest to his heart. The remedy is the father's kiss, the father's bosom, the father's house, the father's love.

Understand my text, then, however paradoxical it may seem, as being a genuine invitation on the part of a gracious God to the most provoking of men. Though they have acted so wickedly that He may well be tired of them, He presses them to hold converse with Him. If anything has been charged upon them in error, He is willing to hear their complaints, only He longs that they will not keep at a sullen distance. God grant that the invitation may be accepted by those of you to whom it will this morning be addressed.

We shall regard our text thus: First, it is a humbling challenge, "Put Me in remembrance: let us plead together." Secondly, as we cannot answer the challenge, we will put another sense upon the words and accept it in an amended version; such as penitence can carry out; and, thirdly, we shall see in it a practical suggestion; perhaps more than one. May the Holy Ghost enable us to learn the lessons and carry out the suggestions!

I. First, then, our text appears before us as

A HUMBLING CHALLENGE.

God had punished Israel on account of sin. Israel was not penitent, but in self-righteousness judged that the Lord was harsh and severe. "Come, then," says God, "come and plead your suit with Me. Put Me in remembrance of any virtues on your part which I may be supposed to have overlooked. If I have misjudged you, if you have not really been neglectful of My service and worship, let the matter be rectified. If really you have a righteousness of your own, put me in remembrance of it."

On looking back we find that the Lord had charged His people with

NEGLECT OF PRAYER:

"But thou hast not called upon Me, O Jacob." This is the charge which we are compelled to bring against all unconverted men and women; you do not call upon God, you live without sincere and fervent prayer. Perhaps you offer a form of prayer; but that is nothing if your heart goes not with the words. This is rather to mock God than truly to call upon Him. But come now; if there be any mistake in this charge, disprove it! If you have earnestly called upon the Lord through Christ Jesus, if you have been diligent in seeking His face, and yet He has turned His back upon you—testify against Him. It will be a new thing under the sun to find a praying heart rejected at the throne of grace. I know you cannot deny the accusation of prayerlessness. If you are Christless you are prayerless. If you have received no mercy it is because you have not sought it at the mercy-seat.

Next the Lord charged it upon Israel that they had not delighted in Him—"Thou hast been weary of Me, O Israel." Is not this a charge which cannot be denied? You men and women who are not regenerate and have never received the pardon of your sin, is it not true that you are weary of God? You readily enough grow tired of a sermon in which we try to speak of Him, though you would listen for hours to a silly tale. You become tired of the Sabbath-day. What a weariness it is! You are weary of the Bible; how little do you read it! a foolish novel suits you better. If you hear Christians talking wisely and seriously of the things of Christ, you have no liking for their words; you would rather listen to a comic song. Can you deny this? If you can, you are invited to state your innocence before the Lord. But I know that in truth you cannot raise the question; for there is within your mind an unquestionable aversion to the service of God; in fact, you would feel happier if there were no God, and if thoughts of eternity never intruded themselves. Take heed lest your aversion become mutual, and God should say, "My soul loathed them, and their soul also abhorred Me."

The Lord had also said that these people did not honor Him—"Thou hast not brough Me the small cattle of thy burnt offerings; neither hast thou honored Me with thy sacrifices." It may be you have presented no tokens of love to the Lord at all; or, on the other hand, you may have brought sacrifices, but you have not honored God by them. You have given that you might be known to give, or because others did so, but not with the view of honoring God. You come and sit with His people and join in their songs, but you do not seek the glory of God thereby; nor is this the main object of your daily life, you know it is not.

Moreover, the Lord charged Israel that they did not love Him—"Thou hast bought Me no sweet cane with money, neither hast thou filled Me with the fat of thy sacrifices." No token of love had been presented, but they had made the Lord to serve with their sins. The purchase of calamus with money had not come into their thoughts.

THEY COULD NOT AFFORD IT,

they said; but when they were worshipping their false gods they could find money enough —"They lavish gold out of the bag, and weigh silver in the balance." So there are men who cannot afford to give anything to the cause of God or Christian charity, but for their sinful pleasures they can waste their substance. No sacrifice is too expensive for a man's lusts: he will do anything that he may live a merry life, which merry life consists in rebellion against God. Plead thine innocence if thou canst. Darest thou take up the glove? Prove that thou hast loved Him. Put Him in remembrance of thy kindly deeds and zealous acts. Thou hast none to bring to remembrance. Thy heart has had no delight in the Lord thy God

The Lord again challenges them upon the charge that they had not obeyed him: "Thou hast made Me to serve with thy sins"—thou hast made Me a very slave with thy waywardness. "Thou hast wearied Me with thine iniquities," God's patience was tried to the utmost with their wanton wickedness. Is not this charge true—sadly true of many? Oh, you that have never accepted Christ, nor cast yourselves at His dear feet, you have by this wilful refusal of love insulted the mercy of the Lord. You have had no respect to His law, you have not checked yourself because you were likely to offend, you have not stirred yourself up to please the Lord. Ah no! you have lived as if you were your own masters. If it be not so, you are now challenged to vindicate your characters.

The challenge before us is occupied not only with the ways of man, but with the ways of God; for the Lord here asserts of Himself, "I have not caused thee to serve with an offering, nor wearied thee with incense." That is to say, God is no hard taskmaster, He is not an austere man, gathering where He has not strawed. The service of God is no bondage.

ASK HIS CHILDREN

how they find it. When they take His yoke upon them and learn of Him, they find rest unto their souls. His ways are ways of pleasantness, and all His paths are peace. Perfect obedience is heaven. If God has treated you like slaves, if He has exacted of you more than His right, if He has made your heart heavy with endless labors, then say so, and state your grievance in solemn converse with God. Only do speak with Him. But who that is in his senses will say that the service of God is anything but liberty?

Though I feel myself quite unable worthily to plead the cause of God as I would desire, I could stand here and weep because of the manner in which His creatures treat Him. I feel ashamed of myself that I can so coldly vindicate His cause, which deserves a far better advocate than I can be. But have ye not, ye that are ungodly, have ye not treated the Lord shamefully? Have ye not forgotten Him who never forgets you? Have you not turned your backs on your Benefactor and your Friend? Have you not refused the service which would have afforded your souls a deep delight? Have you not quarrelled with your mercies, and fought against heaven itself? It is surely so. If you have anything to plead to the contrary, argue it with your Maker; only do not continue to keep away from Him. Turn unto Him and answer His appeal, "Put Me in remembrance: let us plead together: declare thou, that thou mayest be justified."

II. I hope you will be prepared to follow me while our penitence suggests

AN AMENDED VERSION;

I do not mean an alteration of the words, but of the sense. Let us take the text as our consciousness of guilt desires to read it. There are certain things which God in great love invites us to bring before His memory. What are these? Let me tell you. If you cannot take up His challenge, and prove your personal righteousness, let the charges stand, with your silence as an assent to them; and now plead with Him and put Him in remembrance of matters which may serve your turn, and lead to your forgiveness.

First, put the Lord in remembrance of that glorious act of amnesty and oblivion which in sovereign grace He has proclaimed to the sons of men in the preceding verse. Come, now, all guilty and defiled, and say to Him, "Lord, though my iniquities testify against me, I rest upon Thy forgiving word, 'I, even I, am He that blotteth out thine iniquities for Mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins.'" At once, with tears and broken language, put the Lord in remembrance of His gracious promises, and say, "Remember Thy word unto Thy servant, upon which Thou hast caused me to hope." Cry to Him after this fashion, "Lord, do as Thou hast said. Here is one who is full of iniquity. I pray Thee cleanse me. If I had no transgressions Thou couldst not blot them out; but here they are; I beseech Thee blot them out according to Thy word! Behold, I put Thee in remembrance of thy word. O Lord, let me hear Thee say—'Thy sins, which are many, are forgiven.'"

That done, proceed to put the Lord in remembrance of your sins. Make an open, unreserved acknowledgment unto the Lord. Tell Him that you have transgressed. Say, with the returning prodigal, "I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." Hide nothing, for nothing can be hid; conceal nothing, for it cannot be concealed. Be sure your sin will find you out; therefore, find out your sin, and surrender it into the hand of the great God, that He may deal with it.

Confess this also, that you have continued by your sins to go away from Him who invites you to return, and promises you

A WELCOME RECEPTION.

Remember, if you are still out of Christ it is not because God has made you so. He takes an oath, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." He will not have your damnation laid at His door. He saith expressly, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself;" and the tender Saviour cries, "Ye will not come to Me, that ye might have life." Own the truth of this. Though you may have foolishly boasted of your free will aforetime, now be humbled about that wicked will of yours which threatens to be your destruction.

When you have done this, if your spirit is much depressed, and your heart is driven to despair by a sense of your guilt, then I would advise you to put the Lord in remembrance of the extraordinary reason which He gives for pardoning sin: "I, even I, am He that blotteth out thy trangressions for Mine own sake." Say unto Him thus: "Lord, there is no reason in me why Thou shouldst spare me, but do it for Thine own sake—for Thy love's sake, for Thy mercy's sake."

Put the Lord in remembrance of His sovereign grace, and of His all-sufficient power to bless. Put Him in remembrance that He has taken the vilest of the vile and washed them in the blood of Jesus; that He has taken the hardest and most obdurate hearts, and softened them to the praise of the glory of His grace; and then add, "Lord, do all this in me, that I too may magnify thy gracious name!"

When you have gone as far as that in putting God in remembrance, I would with much affection advise you to plead the Lord's purpose and intent revealed in the twenty-first verse: "This people have I formed for Myself; they shall show forth My praise." Say, "Lord, I am thy poor creature. Thou hast made me; even my very body is fearfully and wonderfully made; and the mysterious thing which dwells within me which I call my soul, is also the creature of thy power. Hast thou not made me for Thyself? Wilt Thou not have a desire to the work of Thine own hands? Lord, come and bless me!" This is good arguing. After this fashion obey the word—"Put Me in remembrance: let us plead together."

If that does not ease you, go a little further back in the chapter till you come to the nineteenth verse—"Behold, I will do a new thing; now it shall spring forth; shall ye not know it? I will even make a way in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert. The beast of the field shall honor Me. the dragons and the owls; because I give waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert, to give drink to My people, My chosen." Plead

THAT PUBLISHED DECLARATION!

Say, "Lord, Thou hast said, 'I will do a new thing:' it will indeed be a new thing if I am saved. I am driven to such self-abhorrence, that if ever I am saved I shall be a leading wonder among Thy miracles of grace."

"Saved!—the deed shall spread new glory
Through the shining realms above!
Angels sing the pleasing story,
All enraptured with thy love!"

It may be you can say, "Lord, I have been sighing, and crying, and groaning now by the month together, and I can find no peace. Oh, if Thou wilt but put a new song into my mouth, the dragons and the owls that saw me in my gloom shall open their eyes and be astonished, and honor the Lord God of Israel!" I know some who might say, "Lord, it will fill all the workshop with wonder if I shall rejoice in Jesus. All my friends and companions will wonder that I should become happy and holy through sovereign grace. I am the very last person they would have thought to see converted. Then will they know what Thine arm can do, and confess that this is the finger of God. Men that could not open their mouths except to blaspheme the Lord, shall stand awe-struck— and astonished as they see what a brand is plucked from the burning."

You see I have tried to help you in obeying this word—"Put Me in remembrance;" but I cannot do the work for you. Dear unconverted hearers, you must yourselves make confession and plead for your lives. Specially should I like to hear you begin thus—"Lord, remember Thine only-begotten Son. Hast Thou not declared that it is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners? I am a sinner; Lord, save me! Oh, remember Gethsemane, remember Calvary, remember the bloody sweat, remember the wounds of Thy Well-beloved, remember the cry, 'It is finished!' and give Him to see of the travail of His soul in me! Give me as a spoil to the Risen One, that in me He may see the reward for His pains!" That is the style of pleading. This will ere long bring you rest and ease. God help you not only to hear me now with attention, but to go and see to the doing of it. I fear and tremble lest my labor should be lost through your failing to come to the mark. In vain do you listen if you do not obey.

III. So this brings me to the last point, which is this: our text affords us some PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

If the Lord says to us, "Put Me in remembrance," then, in the first place, it is very clear that we ought to remember these things ourselves. We cannot put another in remembrance of a thing which we ourselves forget. Come, then, let us for a time remind ourselves of certain matters which we are prone to cast behind us. Going over the same ground which I have traversed before, I shall make no apology, since my desire is that God's Spirit may impress it on your hearts.

Oh, you that are not saved, remember the years in which you have lived without prayer! What a wonder that you have been permitted to live at all! Morning light and evening shade, and yet no prayer! Mercies on the table, mercies in the family, mercies to your body, mercies to your soul, and yet no prayer! Sermons heard, exhortations given, gentle entreaties all thrown away, for still there has been no prayer! "Thou hast not called upon Me, O Jacob." It is not good to take our sins in the lump, but to set them out in detail one after the other. Here is a God ready to pardon, and we would not even ask for forgiveness. Here is a God waiting to be gracious, and we have kept Him waiting these forty years. Here is mercy's door before us, and we will not knock, though there is a promise that it shall be opened to every knocker. Here is Jesus Himself knocking at our door till His head is wet with dew, and His locks with the drops of the night, and yet we will not open! Remember that! Let this transgression come before us, and cause us deep repentance and self-humiliation.

Some I would earnestly urge to remember long years of neglect of God's service, with all their niggardliness to the cause of God, all their want of love to God, all the many times in which they have hardened their hearts, stopped their ears, and refused the warnings and invitations of their Saviour. Such memories might be used of the Holy Spirit for their conviction. Oh, dear, unconverted hearers, am I speaking the truth about you or not? God forbid I should bring a false accusation against any man! I am not charging you now with the blacker and more open sins, for perhaps you are innocent of them, but yet this is forgetfulness of God, weariness of His service, refusal to receive the salvation of His Son. "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light." You think of your business, and yet the great business of your salvation causes you no concern. Think of that; you put your dying body before the immortal soul. You are full of care and anxiety about matters which relate only to a span of time, and yet you care not for your eternal interests. Can you justify this? Are you in your senses? Why do you act so foolishly? There is a God whose smile is heaven and whose frown is hell, and yet you ignore His existence, and neither seek Him nor serve him.

I know I plead but badly, but my cause is a good one, and if you are right at heart you will feel its force. Ought not the wrongs done to God to be owned and forsaken? Say, dear hearer, "I do remember my faults this day, and remembering them I will arise and go unto my Father, and put Him in remembrance that I may be forgiven." My faith sees the Lord standing here blotting out the debts of all who will bring them to His remembrance. Come, bring your bills! Hand in the record of your debts to justice! Spread them now before the face of the Lord, not that He may condemn you for them, but that He may stamp them with the atoning blood and say, "I have blotted out thy sins." Do not hesitate to put the Lord in remembrance of them, for then He promises to forget them.

I am sure if I could stand here to-morrow and exercise the power to remit all debts by giving a receipt in full for them all, if the one condition were that each debtor would produce his schedule of debts, no one would be backward in doing so. You who owe anything would search your files, rake out your drawers, and look in every place to find out every unpaid account, so as to have them all blotted out. I pray you do so in this spiritual business. Bring your sins to remembrance by humble acknowledgment and penitent confession, for "if we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." O Spirit of God, support this appeal to these my hearers, and send it home to the hearts of Thy chosen, that they may confess their iniquities unto Thee and be saved this day!

Thus have I tried to plead with you for the Lord, wishing only your good and His glory. I am very conscious of my own weakness, much more so, perhaps, than ever I was in my life, but yet I expect to succeed with many of you. What am I apart from the Spirit of all grace? What am I but as a sounding brass and as a tinkling cymbal? And yet I am not feebler than other servants of God in this respect, for we are all nothing apart from the Spirit.

"Till God diffuse His graces down,
Like showers of heavenly rain,
In vain Apollos sows the ground,
And Paul may plant in vain."

Blessed be God we shall not plant in vain, for He is with us! Some of you have received the message, and I shall hear from you soon. Let it sink into the spirits of all of you. Do you feel any degree of softness creeping over you? Yield to it. It is the blessed Spirit now inclining you to relent, making you feel serious and thoughtful, and anxious and desirous. Bow before His heavenly breath as the rush by the river yields to the wind! Yours shall be the benefit, but to the sweet Spirit of love, together with the Father and the Son, shall be glory forever and ever. Amen, and Amen.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S ENCOUNTER WITH BUFFALOES.

IN the year 1855 Dr. Livingstone, the great missionary explorer, was penetrating the interior of Africa in a direction entirely new to him. During the journey he desired to cross the river Zambesi near the village of a chief named Mpende, but the people of the village, instead of manifesting willingness to help the party, prepared to attack it. Armed men were seen gathering from all quarters, and spies frequently approached the Makololo encampment. To two of these Livingstone handed the leg of an ox, desiring them to take it to Mpende, who, on receiving it, sent two old men to inquire who the donor was. "I am a Lekoa" (an Englishman), was the reply. "We don't know the tribe," they said; "we suppose you are Mozunga (Portuguese), with whom we have been fighting." As the Portuguese they knew, were half-castes, Livingstone bared his bosom and asked if they had hair and skin like his. "No," they replied, "we never saw skin so white as that. Ah! you must be one of the tribe that loves the black man." They returned to Mpende, who decided to grant a passage to the white man and his followers, and had them ferried across the river in canoes.

While travelling through a somewhat hilly country just before reaching the confines of Mpende's territory, Livingstone's travelling procession was suddenly interrupted by three wild buffaloes, as shown in our picture on page 700. The bush was exceedingly dense and very high; and as they were going along among the trees the buffaloes, which they had unconsciously passed above the wind, thinking that they were surrounded by men, dashed through the line of Livingstone's attendants, and scattered them in all directions. The missionary's ox set off at a gallop, and when he could manage to glance back, he saw one of the men up in the air about five feet above a buffalo, which was rushing madly along with a stream of blood running down his flank. When Livingstone reached the poor fellow, he found that he had alighted on his face, and, though he had been carried on the horns of the buffalo about twenty yards before getting the final toss, the skin was not pierced, nor was a bone broken. It seems that when the beasts suddenly appeared, the man had thrown down his load and stabbed one in the side. It turned suddenly upon him and carried him off. A week afterward he was well and able to proceed on his journey.

When they got beyond the dominions of Sekelétu, they felt some anxiety as to the manner in which they would be received by a tribe whom the Makololo regarded as being in rebellion against their chief. The people of one village seemed disposed to be friendly, but those of another made hostile demonstrations. They began by attempting to spear a young man who had gone for water. Failing in that, they approached the travellers, and one of them, howling like a maniac and with eyes protruding and foaming lips, stood close to Livingstone, brandishing a small battle-axe with a ferocity which was anything but soothing to the nerves. Livingstone felt some alarm, but judiciously disguised it from the dusky spectators, and would not allow his men to knock the savage on the head, as they wished to do.

When his courage had been sufficiently tested, he beckoned to one of the friendly villagers to lead the madman away, and was glad to see the gleaming battle-axe at a safe distance. The Makololo and their leader were threatened with destruction. "They are lost," it was said; "they have wandered in order to be destroyed." But one of their friends did them good service by explaining their character and intentions, and they escaped without molestation.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

Mr. W. F. Faherestock, a subscriber at Harrisburg, Pa., who is himself a remarkable instance of the Lord's healing power, sends the following narrative of the restoration to health of a lady who has been afflicted for nine years:

"There are few persons in Pottsville unacquainted with Miss Annie Sterner, a young lady, who for a number of years has been affected with spinal disease, and for the last eight or nine years has been unable to walk, even with the aid of crutches. During that time her constant prayer has been for the restoration of her health, but latterly her attention having been directed to the many instances of Christ's healing power in the persons of others, she has prayed with more faith and hope. A few nights ago she retired to rest as usual. During the night she had a strange dream, in which she was informed that she was cured. When she awoke the impressions of her dream were still upon her mind, and she felt as if she was in the realization of its truth. She soon demonstrated the fact for herself by getting up and walking across the floor. Ever since then she has discarded her crutches and moves about apparently cured. A few days ago she was down-town as far as Sixth Street. These are the plain facts of the case. The lady, who is about twenty-five years of age, has suffered intense pain for many years, and the best medical skill has failed to effect a cure. She herself is thoroughly convinced that her restoration is the result of Divine interposition in answer to believing prayer."

In a letter dated Germantown, Pa., from Thomas W. Whitall to Miss Carrie F. Judd, the writer says: "To be brief about my disease (a matter of no account to us when we have surrendered it to the Lord): I was healed last September of chronic nervous exhaustion, and, bless His Holy Name, only for a few hours since then has my faith wavered. He has permitted its testing, at times, severely, but never, when my eyes were kept on Him, has the temptation been greater than I could bear. How to thank Him enough for the sense of restful security about all bodily concerns I do not know.

"There is one more point which, on account of its having been almost neglected, should receive the earnest, prayerful attention of every child of the Lord's who loves to do his Master's whole will. This is the treatment of our bodies.

"As we are taught that sickness is the result of sin, let us prayerfully set to work to find out what are the divine laws which govern these wonderful bodies of ours, and let us be fervent about it."

Ann Grinstead, writing from Glasgow, Ky., May 16th, 1883, says: "For several years I was a great sufferer, as it seemed from every pain and ache that flesh could be heir to. Was treated by seven different physicians, without any abiding relief. I also tried all the patent remedies that came within my reach, but with ever the same results. Yet I could not give up. At last something seemed to speak within my soul: 'Only the Saviour can reach your case.' I was a Christian, but did not know how to take hold by faith for the healing of the body. God opened my way to go to 'Pink Cottage,' a faith-cure home in my own State, and there I learned the blessed way of trusting Jesus. After giving myself wholly to Him, I took Him as my only Physician.

"At this time I was willing to die and leave my little ones, for my will was entirely swallowed up in God's will. Then a thrill passed through my entire body, casting out all pain and disease. I was very happy and enjoyed the 'peace of God' as never before. I am now able to do my work and often walk half a mile twice a day, and visit the sick very often, telling them of my own wonderful restoration. The Lord is my strength and my comfort, and I praise Him with my whole heart for this."

On October 10th, at Bethshan, London, the following narrative was given by Mr. Joseph Moody, who has himself experienced the Lord's healing power:

"Some few months ago I received a message from Bethshan to go and see Miss Boulton, of Melton Ross, Barnetby, near Grimsby. I found in a little room a very suffering woman. From the age of nineteen she had been so afflicted from curvature of the spine and abscesses in her breast that she had never been down-stairs for nineteen years, except once, when in a fit, she had fallen down, and had to be carried to bed. She said she had several times asked the Lord to heal her; but she was doubtful if it was His will. So I asked the Lord to teach me what to say to her.

"I said, 'I have two little girls at home; suppose one of them did something one morning to grieve me, and I whipped her, and she afterward felt very sorry for having grieved me, and came to me in the evening, and said, "Father, I'm very sorry I grieved you, I won't do so again, please forgive me." Suppose I said, "It's all very well for you to say you are sorry, I'm not to be put off in that way, I shall go on whipping you at times all day." If after doing so I told her at night that I loved her, would she believe me? If she had not acknowledged her fault, I should have been justified in continuing to punish her, but when she owned her fault I could not have kept my anger. Now don't you think if you went to your heavenly Father and told Him you were sorry He should ever have had to chastise you, He will cure you?' She said, 'I can trust Him.'

"So I anointed her with oil in the name of the Lord, and left her. On the Tuesday all pain left one diseased part of her body, and on the Wednesday afternoon at three o'clock the other diseased part was made free."

A MIGHTIER LOVE.

In a magnificently furnished room in one of the stateliest houses of a great city a fashionable party was gathered around a dining table. The choice viands, the exquisite silver articles with which the table was spread all told of wealth and luxury. The conversation was refined and intellectual, many of the guests being men and women prominent in the most cultured society. The occasion was the return from their bridal tour of Harold Grey and his handsome wife. Both bride and bridegroom belonged to families highly respected in the city and the dinner given by the bride's father in honor of their return home had been long anticipated with pleasure by a select circle of friends.

All formality was dispensed with, and the conversation was general, though sparkling with wit and humor. At length the ladies rose, and Harold Grey opened the door for them to pass out. His wife was the last, and as she approached he bent upon her an earnest, admiring gaze, as with queenly grace she moved past him.

"Harold," she said, in an undertone, "do not stay long over the wine. I shall be dull in the drawing-room without you." She spoke tenderly and lovingly, but there was a note of entreaty in her voice, which went to the husband's heart.

"No, dear," he said, "we will not remain more than half an hour."

The door was closed, and the gentlemen resumed their seats. The half hour passed quickly, while politics, the state of trade and the affairs of society were discussed. The wine circulated freely, and Harold wished he had not been quite so definite in replying to his wife. But he rose punctually, and begged his friends to excuse him.

Mrs. Grey Appeals to Her Husband.

"No," said one of them, "we cannot spare you yet. Sit down a few minutes, and then we will all go. It is early days for you to surrender your liberty. You have a charming wife, but she must not monopolize you. If you take orders so early in your married life you will have to submit all through. Now, be reasonable and sociable, like a good fellow, or we shall feel that we have been robbed of our most cherished companion."

So urged, Harold resumed his seat, and the jest and story and witty repartees soon made him forget his promise. Harold was one of those men whose genial nature rendered him supremely happy in masculine society, and the men around him on this occasion were his most intimate friends whom he had not seen for nearly half a year, during which he and his wife had been in Europe. But looking at his watch presently he discovered that it was nearly two hours since he had made that promise to his wife. He was vexed and sorry, and immediately rose and claimed the fulfilment of his friends' promise to accompany him to the drawing-room.

"Yes," said the one who had urged him to remain, "and if you think you are likely to have a curtain lecture I will help you make peace."

Meanwhile Beatrice Grey was sitting among her friends, listening to feminine gossip without paying much attention to their words. She glanced now and again uneasily at the door, and as the time passed became uneasy. It was not so much that she was hurt by her husband's failure to keep the promise he had made to her, as that there was deep down in her heart a vague dread which she had held down and would not admit even to herself. The husband she loved, almost idolized, was a weaker man than she had thought him. Since their marriage she had observed him more closely than she had opportunity of doing before, and probably he too had relaxed some of the devotion of the lover, and was less upon his guard than when he had not secured his prize. More than once during their tour in Europe he had entered her room with his face flushed and with an unnatural gayety that had been inexplicable to her at first. Afterward, however, it dawned upon her that the occasions on which she had noticed this alteration in his appearance and manner were those succeeding an absence with other gentlemen. Was it possible, she asked herself, that the man to whom she had given herself was a slave to the wine cup? It could not be, for he was so strong, so affectionate, so devoted to her. Yet there was sufficient in what she had seen to give her cause for uneasiness when he was away from her, but which he charmed away when he talked to her and caressed her.

The young man who had volunteered to save Harold Grey from a curtain lecture soon found that his services were not needed. Mrs. Grey was not the lady to permit any young man to talk to her about her husband, and very quickly ended any overtures on that subject. Nor was there at any time any danger of curtain lectures for her husband. She had too much sense and too much delicacy to lower herself into the querulous, complaining manner by which some wives wear away their husbands' patience and love. Very delicately she endeavored to attract him to her side and to win him away from the society in which his danger lay.

It was a struggle that covered many years, in which the influence of the wife was pitted against the influence of the husband's enemies whom he called his friends. Who can tell what the wife suffered in that struggle! With what helpless indignation she saw men of honor, men professing Christianity, luring her husband into scenes in which he always lost his self-control. They praised his wit, delighted in his songs, called him excellent company, but they never thought or seemed to care that they were aiding in his degradation. And all the time the wife, ever careful of her husband's good name, could not bring herself to say, "My husband is weak; do not tempt him."

And, after all, she failed. Harold Grey, cursing his weakness, hating himself for his outrages on his wife's love, sank steadily downward. Not one word of reproach did he hear from her, but he noted the anxious look and the pallid cheek and the glance of horror with which she now refused to touch intoxicating liquor. He resolved again and again to break off his evil habit for her sake, but even love for her, the most potent force in his nature, was defeated, and there came a time when he was scarcely ever quite sober.

Happily for both, however, a deliverance was at hand. Harold Grey was found one night by a young clergyman who knew him, helplessly intoxicated on the street. He took him to his home, and then for the first time Beatrice Grey opened her heart. Mr. Leigh listened in silence, then prayed with her, and, asking permission to call again in the morning, left. The next day he had a long talk with Harold Grey. His sympathy and manly frankness won from Harold his whole story of broken resolutions and vain attempts to overcome for his wife's sake, ending with a despairing statement that he had now no hope. But Mr. Leigh had seen more desperate cases cured among his people, who, though with less culture and more brutality, had been rescued. To this man of culture and sensibility he preached the same remedy, and pointed him to a Saviour able to save to the uttermost. What self-respect and wifely love could not do was done by the almighty power of Jesus. Harold Grey was delivered, and both he and his wife never cease to bless the day when they first heard of the mighty power of a Saviour's love to snap asunder the chains of sinful indulgence.

A SERIAL STORY.

The News at Home.

DAVID was naturally a bright boy, active in mind and body; but he was crushed by the sudden and extreme penalty that had befallen him. He had all along known that the police were "down" upon begging; but it had not entered his mind that he could ever actually get into jail except for thieving. Among the street-lads of his acquaintance many a one had been in for some short term for picking pockets or stealing from the street-stalls; but few of these had ever been sentenced to three months' imprisonment. He would not have begged if he could have worked; but no man of the hundreds of thousands about him had offered him work, or seen that he was taught to work. Yet here he was for three months in jail, a lad who had never known any will to guide him but his own untrained and vagrant nature, and his mother's kindly and weak indulgence.

The first glimmer of hope came to him when he was set to learn shoemaking. This was a trade by which he could earn a living—not the trade he would have chosen (his ambition was to be a carpenter like his unknown father), but still honest, real work. He received his first lesson in a handicraft with ardor, and sat with an old boot on his knee, picking it to pieces with unwearying industry. If he could only learn as much as to mend his mother's shoes before his term was out!

The jail was a large one, and the number of prisoners great. David had been asked if he was a Protestant or a Roman Catholic—a question he did not understand, and could not answer. He was classed with the Protestants, and put under the care of the jail-chaplain, who saw him among the other prisoners, and taught him his duty toward God in a class, but who could not find time to give him any individual attention, as he was engaged in an important controversy.

He could not have put his thoughts into words, but they were none the less in his heart —dim, bewildering, and oppressive; and he pondered over them night and day. Very few persons spoke to him, and he was never ready to speak in reply. Those who taught him thought him a blockhead, or fancied that he was at least shamming incapacity and vacancy of mind. As a matter of fact his mind was always absent, except at his cobbling lesson; for he was incessantly brooding over the recollection of his free life, and of the poor desolate home he had been so suddenly torn from.

David had no idea of writing to his mother, or hearing from her. No such thing as a letter reaching them, or being written in their home, had ever occurred within his memory. The policeman was a much more frequent visitor than the postman in their street. Yet he longed for her to know where he was. Day after day he wondered what had happened to her and Bess, and knew they were wondering and fretting about him. The only comfort he had—the only miserable spark of hope—was in thinking he should know how to mend their shoes when he went home.

It was therefore with a sudden burst as of sunshine that he learned one day that prisoners might write to their friends once in three months. The schoolmaster gave him the writing materials, and he took unwearied pains over a letter to his mother. The sheet of notepaper contained the address of the jail, and under it David wrote, in his crooked, ill-formed characters, as follows:

"DEAR MUTHER: I was took up for beging, and cent to jal, and I'm lernin' to mend shoos. Don't yu fret about me. I luv yu and Bess. They'll let me out in 3 munths, and I'll mend yure shoos. I've kep my hands from pickin' and steelin' as muther ses. God bless yu. From david fell yure luvin' son.'

He slept that night more soundly than he had ever done before within the prison-walls, and dreamed pleasant dreams of working for his mother, and buying her and little Bess all they needed with the money he had earned.

When Mrs. Fell and Bess bade Euclid and Victoria good night, and went down-stairs to their own room, they felt cheered and comforted by the neighborliness they had received. Bess was ready to declare Victoria the prettiest and cleverest girl in the world. As they opened their door, they saw a letter lying just within it, which had been slipped through the nick below it, and which was scarcely visible in the darkness. Such an extraordinary event—one which had never befallen them before—filled them with so much astonishment, that it was with trembling hands Bess stooped to pick it up. It was a real letter, with a stamp and post-mark upon it, though they could hardly believe their own eyes. There was no light in their own room, not even a dim farthing candle to burn; and there was no resource but to carry the strange letter to the gas-light on the stairs, and read it there as quickly and quietly as possible, with the very probable chance of some of their neighbors coming by and watching them inquisitively.

It must be news of David; there was no one else in the world to write to them. Bess could not read writing, and it was no easy task to Mrs. Fell. But as soon as she unfolded the sheet of paper, which was headed by the name of the jail where he was imprisoned printed plainly upon it, and which she read half aloud before the meaning reached her brain, she uttered a piercing shriek of anguish, which rang through the whole house, and brought every inmate of it running into the passages and upon the staircases. Mrs. Fell was lying in a deep swoon upon the floor, and Bess was kneeling beside her, calling to her, and trying to raise her up. Blackett was the first to reach her; and the half-drunken man gave her a rough push with his foot, uttering a brutal oath.

"You leave her alone!" cried old Euclid, hurrying down-stairs, and confronting Blackett with a courage that astonished himself when he came to think of it; "you leave Mrs. Fell be! She's been spendin' the evenin' with me and my daughter, and I'll take care on her. You ain't no man if you'd kick a poor sickly woman like her. You're a coward if you touch her again, and I say so. Ain't he?" he shouted in his hoarse voice, as he turned with a quivering face and excited gestures to the cluster of neighbors gathered about them.

"Ay, he is!" cried the crowd with so unanimous a voice, that Blackett even was cowed by it, and, contenting himself with muttering some bad language, retreated to his own place. Two or three of the neighbors helped Euclid to carry the poor woman into her room. Even to them, used to destitution as they were, it seemed bare of everything. There was no seat left, unless a few bricks, picked up in the street, could be called seats; and they had to lay her down upon the mere sacking of the bedstead, from which the bed and clothing had all disappeared. Euclid gazed round him with a strange pity stirring at his heart, mingled with a sense of superior comfort in his own circumstances. He felt almost like a rich man.

"This is bad, worse than any on us," he said; "and she might ha' been the widow of any one on you. I vote as we make a little collection for her in the house; and I'll begin with a shillin', and that's more than I've earned to-day. Some on you can do it easier than me."

"She gets parish pay every Tuesday," objected one of the women who stood by.

"And pays arf on it out for rent," replied Euclid; "it's short-commons after that."

"She's always a-hungered," sobbed Bess; "nothin' can satisfy mother."

"She ought to go into the house, where she'd have medicine and everythink," said another voice; "the orficer says so."

"Who says she ought to go into the house?" asked Euclid, lifting up his head, and looking round him with eyes almost bright with indignation. "She, as is a decent, hard-workin' woman, and a honest man's widow! She's not the sort as goes into the house. We know who goes there—bad women, as no decent man 'ud look at, and drunken women, and swearin', cursin' women. There couldn't be worse folks in hell; and I'd as lief say she ought to go to hell; the company 'ud be as good. Don't nobody speak o' goin' to the house while I'm by."

Old Euclid had always been regarded by his neighbors as a quiet, timid old man, who hadn't a word to cast at a dog. There was something so unusual both in his vehement words and his excited gestures, that, one by one, they slunk out of the miserable room in silence, leaving him and Bess to the task of bringing back the fainting woman to consciousness. She was still clutching the letter convulsively in her fingers; but, as Bess opened them to chafe the palms of her cold hands, it fluttered down upon the floor. Euclid picked it up, and carried it to the light of the candle, which somebody had brought in, and left upon the chimney-piece.

"Who's it from?" asked Bess anxiously. "Is it from Davy?"

"Ah! 'David Fell, your lovin' son,'" he read; "but it comes from jail! He's in jail!"

Euclid's gray old head dropped, and his voice sank into a hoarse murmur. It was no longer a wonder to him that Mrs. Fell had fallen into a death-like swoon. The workhouse was terrible; but the jail was a lower depth still. He stood silent for a few minutes thinking. David had always been a sort of favorite with him; he liked his bright, boyish face, and his merry whistle as he stepped briskly about. And the lad had often carried his basket for him, and shouted "Creases!" with his clear young voice, when his own throat was dry and husky with crying them all day about the streets. But now David Fell was a jail-bird!

Presently there came to his ear the feeble murmur of his name from David's mother; and he hastened to her side, looking down on her ashy face with a strange gentleness in his sunken eyes.

"Please read it up loud," she said in a laborious whisper, as if she had scarcely strength to form the words with her trembling lips. Euclid read the few lines in a measured voice, giving every word its fullest length; and then he folded it up again, and laid it down near the mother's hand.

"It's only for beggin'!" he cried. "Three months for beggin' for his mother! God help us all! There's something wrong somewhere. Them justices must have hearts like mine, I s'pose; yet they sent Davy to jail for three months for beggin' for his mother! If they'd only take the time for to see what they'd done! But there! they don't take the time, or they'd never punish a lad like David, the son of a decent, hard-workin' woman, as was left a widow with two children to keep. God help us all!"

"It's only for beggin'!" murmured Mrs. Fell, with tears streaming down her cheeks—"only for beggin'!"

"Don't you take on too much," urged Euclid. "He'll come home all right, and I'll look after the lad for you."

But it was hard for Mrs. Fell to comfort herself about David. It was no uncommon event for boys in their street to get into jail; but it was almost always for stealing, and she knew no one would believe that David had been sent there for begging only. How Blackett would glory and triumph in it! His elder sons were known to be thieves, and he was constantly pushing and urging Roger into the same course, in the hope of getting him off his hands. Yet it had never once crossed her mind that her own boy Davy could ever be in prison. His father had been an honest, industrious artisan, priding himself on never touching his neighbor's goods by so much as a finger; and she had not thought of David failing, under any stress of temptation, to follow in his steps. David was no thief; but still he was in jail! She kept murmuring to herself, "It's only for beggin'!" But was the bitterness lessened to her that her only son had met with such a penalty for so slight a fault? He would come out into the world branded as if he had been a thief, with the shame of a jail clinging to him through the rest of his life.

Euclid and Victoria were very good to her in her fresh trouble, and helped her as far as their means allowed; the little store of money for Victoria's burial suffering thereby. Many of the neighbors, too, thought of her, and brought her from time to time a morsel of their own not over-abundant food. Even Blackett offered her help, which she turned away from with a sick heart. She was not quite so starved and friendless as she had been before her desperate circumstances were discovered; but she felt more heart-broken, and there was none to comfort her. Victoria repeated her hymns and verses to her; but they seemed words without meaning in her great sorrow. She had set before her one aim—to see her children start in life honest and blameless, as their father had been before them. Night and day she had toiled and denied herself to this end. She had given herself no rest, but had struggled on through grievous pain, and in great darkness of spirit; and she had failed. The hard battle had been fought, and she was conquered.

"Davy 'ud have made a good man," she moaned to herself through the long, sleepless nights, as she thought of him in jail. "He'd have growed up like his father, if I could ha' kep' up another two-three years. It's come too soon on me. But now he's got a sully and a stain on him as'll never wash off, live as long as he may. He's been in jail, folks'll say. And whatever'll become o' Bess if Davy goes wrong? He'd have kep' her up if he'd been a good man. O Lord! he'd have made a good man, only for this. And now he's in jail!"

Bess was all that was left to her, and she could scarcely bear to let her go out of her sight. Blackett, who swore and raged at every one else, was beginning to speak kindly to Bess, and this filled the heart of the poor dying mother with unutterable terror. She had often been proud of her child's dark eyes and pretty hair, and thought of her own face when David Fell was courting her. Oh, if Davy was but at home again, always with Bess, unconsciously shielding her from untold dangers! Suppose even that she died before Davy's time was up! If she should never, never see her boy's face again! And to leave Bess alone, quite alone!

It would have been a hard and bitter sorrow to leave her children, if she had a good hope of their doing well; but, oh, how infinitely harder and more bitter it was to die while David was in jail, and when Blackett was speaking kindly to little Bess!

Once she tried to say, "It's God's will, and He knows best;" but something seemed to stop her. She could not utter the words, even to her own heart.

SAUL REJECTED.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 11. 1 Sam. 15: 12-26. Golden Text, ver. 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Saul's Last Opportunity—Unconfessed Sin not Forgotten—The Commission to Saul—Amalek as a Type—Extermination of the Sinful Nature—Saul's Failure under Success—Limiting Obedience—God's Commands Revised by Saul—His Delusion—Self Feigning Death—Samuel's Weighty Words—Obedience Paramount—The Little Vexations of Life—Keeping up Appearances.

SAUL had already failed in obedience toward God (ch. 13: 8-14), and already Samuel had declared to him that God had sought Him a man after His own heart to be captain over Israel; but in our lesson for to-day we see the forbearance of our God in giving Saul yet another chance. Samuel came to Saul, and said, "The Lord sent me to anoint thee king over His people, over Israel: now therefore hearken thou unto the voice of the words of the Lord." It was an appeal for obedience on the part of Saul. He could not be as the kings of the nations were, because the people whom he governed belonged to Another, even to his God, and he could only govern them under God. Would that every Christian parent, matron, or employer having Christian children, servants, or others placed under them, would recognize this principle! We can only rule for God as we rule by God.

Saul was God's representative, and was therefore not to be occupied with his own cause, but God's. Through Samuel the Lord told him how He remembered "that which Amalek did to Israel, how He laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt." Four hundred years had elapsed, but God had not forgotten His own word, "the Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation" (Ex. 17: 16). Unconfessed sin cannot be forgotten by God: "Now go and smite Amalek, and all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, and camel and ass." This is the measure with which God speaks of the body of sin, of which Amalek was a type. "Our old man is crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin" (Rom. 6: 6).

Saul gathered his people together, came down to a city of Amalek, called upon the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, and smote them from Havilah until thou comest to Shur. So far well; but Saul was not able to bear success; seeing that he was carrying all before him, he began to exercise about the commands which God had given him. God had said, "Utterly destroy;" but while Saul utterly destroyed the people, "he took Agag the king of the Amalekites alive," and he and the people shared "the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings, and the lambs, and all that was good, and would not utterly destroy them; but everything that was vile and refuse, that they destroyed utterly." Oh, how terribly is this spirit abroad. God says "that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin," and men on all hands seek to make out that God's Word on this point is a fond delusion. Some say that they live without sin, but when they are found to be sore about wrongs which are done to them, when they yield to expediency, and so fail to provide things honest in the sight of all men, they give as an excuse that this is not sin, but only human nature, thus altogether ignoring that our life on earth, as crucified with Christ, is to be Christ's nature. On the other hand, others will plainly declare that we cannot live without committing sin, and on either side God's Word and His truth are tampered with. If we cannot live without committing sin, how much sin is necessarily compulsory, asked a preacher yesterday? and from how much does the blood of Jesus cleanse? Saul and the people had their own ideas as to that which was to be destroyed, and that which was to be spared; so have most people.

But God was looking on: and He called Samuel, who was never so occupied that he could not listen to his Lord, and said, "It repenteth Me that I have set up Saul to be king: for he is turned back from following Me, and hath not performed My commandments." Samuel had foreseen this; but instead of comfortably going off to sleep with the words, "I said it would be so," "he cried unto the Lord all night." Saul slept well enough; Samuel felt his sin more than he did himself; when at last they met, Saul, full of his own deeds, began, "Blessed be thou of the Lord: I have performed the commandment of the Lord."

POOR DELUDED SAUL!

he did not see with God's eyes, and he must have been startled with the prophet's answer, "What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?" That which is utterly destroyed can neither low nor bleat. We have heard men stand up in a meeting and say, "I am clean from all sin, and self is entirely dead," and the very first unjust thing which was said about them showed plainly that the self was only asleep, and slept very lightly, too. If self can feel an injury, if self kicks against injustice, if self resents being humbled, if self gets anxious about the future, if self tries to get the best of a bargain, it is a very queer death that it has died. "What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?"

Saul was found out; he could not say that was dead which was alive enough to cry out, so he must do one of two things: either acknowledge he was in the wrong, or make an excuse. Alas! he chose the latter, and it was a miserable excuse, very illogical as most excuses are; he laid the blame on the people, saying that they spared the sheep and cattle, and adding a very good motive for it, it was to sacrifice unto the Lord their God. If Saul were king, it argued badly for his authority over the people that they should take the disposal of the prey into their own hands, the excuse was as bad as the sin, and then that it was for sacrifice, a sacrifice whose very existence was an act of disobedience, could not be very acceptable to God!

Samuel did not argue with Saul, but said, "I will tell thee what the Lord hath said to me this night." Then he reminded him that when he was little in his own eyes the Lord had raised him up and made him king, and intrusted him with the destruction of Amalek, and then appealed to him, why did he fly upon the spoil? Saul sought still to justify himself at the expense of the people, and then Samuel spoke the strongest words of condemnation, "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, and to hearken than the fat of rams. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry. Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, He hath also rejected thee from being king." This is the mind of God, to obey is better than sacrifice. Many are full of zeal for the service of God, and esteem themselves much better than others, because of the sacrifice of time, money, etc., which they make for His work. But very often this is not really the least sacrifice to them, they would be most unhappy if they did not do it, and perhaps those very people are not half so ready to give up the best seat in a railway carriage, to bear some inconvenience in their house, to be kept waiting by a hackdriver, or some other similar thing which God has permitted to happen in the day, on purpose that they might deny self in that little thing, and obey Him by taking up what really was a cross and following Him.

TO OBEY IS BETTER THAN SACRIFICE,

Saul, forced into a corner, owned that he had sinned, but it was no spontaneous confession, and the poor man did not go to God to get the matter rectified. "I have sinned;" he said, "for I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord, and thy words: because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice. Now, therefore, I pray thee, pardon my sin, and turn again with me, that I may worship the Lord." Saul wanted to get right with Samuel, but made no attempt to get right with God. He wanted to stand well with Samuel, and through Samuel's faith to get near to God, but this kind of thing cannot answer with Him who is the Searcher of all hearts. Samuel refused, saying, "I will not return with thee; for thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee from being king over Israel." But Saul laid hold of his mantle: it rent, and Samuel took occasion to say that the Lord had rent the kingdom from him, and given it to a neighbor who was better than he, and reminded him also, "The Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent: for He is not a man, that he should repent."

Saul was not really humbled; he did not manifest the least real hatred for his sin, he wanted to stand well, not only with Samuel, but also with the people; and to appear to them what he was not, poor, mean, despicable man! "Then he said, I have sinned: yet honor me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people, and before Israel, and turn again with me, that I may worship the Lord thy God." Oh, how piteous is this spirit! Here is a man thoroughly wrong at heart, rotten at the core, and instead of going direct to God and humbling himself that he might be put really right, he seeks knowing all the time that God has rejected him. Are any of my readers in this state? Poor, poor souls, the disclosure must come, sin must out. Oh, be wise, confess, and return to God and to the cleansing blood while you may.

Samuel turned again with Saul; but it was upon one condition, Agag must be hewed in pieces before the Lord. A testimony must be borne for the holiness of God, He cannot be made a Party to sin, and a part of that day's worship was the carrying out of God's command. "Agag came unto him delicately. And Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past," but Samuel had nothing to do with Agag but to execute God's command. God had said "Destroy," and destroy He would. He "hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal." Samuel saw all things in the light of God. From this time there was no more communication between God's prophet and the rejected king of Israel; "Samuel came no more to see Saul unto the day of his death." But Samuel mourned for Saul; he had begun well, but was now as God said, turned aside from following Him. Samuel could not be insensible to this, he saw the danger of Saul's soul far more than if his heart had never been changed. And God? Oh, how terrible are those words, "the Lord repented that He had made Saul king over Israel." The Lord Himself lead us into and keep us in a life of reality!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Sensation Produced in England by the two pamphlets describing the condition of the poor in London and other great cities has continued to increase. The problem of dealing with pauperism has suddenly come to the front with overwhelming force, and the public insists on its solution. The Marquis of Salisbury, the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords, has already propounded a scheme so radical in its provisions that it is stigmatized as "disguised socialism." He recommends under certain conditions a system of State loans to promote the better housing of the poor. He suggests that the spending of such loans should not be intrusted to the local authorities, but be committed to the Peabody trustees. He affirms that "public loans are justified by the ingenious considerations of public policy, even if all thoughts of humanity are cast aside." He thinks the working population should be transferred to places outside the town, where good houses should be built for them. The Pall Mall Gazette, an influential journal, the organ of the party most intensely opposed to that of Lord Salisbury, says: "Since the memorable days when Mr. Gladstone startled Europe by his pamphlet on the Bulgarian horrors, no English statesman has launched a manifesto likely to have such wide and permanent effects as that of Lord Salisbury." Other social reformers have suggested schemes to deal with the same evil, which it is evident from the tone of the press is now regarded as having the most urgent claim on the attention of statesmen. That the condition of the English poor is really deplorable there can be no doubt, and that it is becoming dangerous may be inferred from the published remarks of the Bishop of St. Albans, a moderate prelate, who declares that the state of England to-day is that of France in the years immediately preceding the revolution. A gloomy view of the case is also taken by the London Standard, a journal not disposed to sensationalism. It says: "London, long indifferent, has suddenly learned that there is more poverty in its streets than in the worst part of Ireland. In squalid dens the poor herd, multiply, and die. Parliament cannot help them. The measures already passed are impotent. Philanthropy is misdirected. Societies are formed to help discharged convicts, while honest workmen are left to starve, and respectable girls are turned from the doors of Magdalen asylums because they lack the necessary qualification." What appears to be most needed, as a first step, is for a few landowners, whose wealth, drawn from the rents of these wretched dwellings, is enormous, to follow the example of the great American philanthropist and erect dwellings for the poor on the Peabody plan.

The French Government is Pushing Forward its campaign in Madagascar. A cable message from Paris states that advices have been received from Tamatave, Madagascar, under date of October 11th, that the French man-of-war Vandeuil had left that port with orders, it was reported, to bombard Manhanaroo and other southern ports of the island. The government has agreed to pay $5000 to Mr. Shaw, the English missionary, whom its representative imprisoned, to compensate him for his losses and the indignities he suffered, and to apologize. The English Government is also demanding an apology for insults to the British flag in the Madagascar waters.

The Negotiations between France and China, relative to the Tonquin difficulty, have made no progress. The European correspondents of American daily journals concur in considering the situation as extremely critical. The French Government appears to be afflicted with incurable duplicity. It has published an official report, called "a yellow book" purporting to give an account of the correspondence between the government and that of China. It was so garbled that a large part of it was incomprehensible, and the other part was so full of direct falsification, and misrepresentation, that the Chinese minister in self-defence issued the full text of the despatches for the information of Europe. The general impression in Europe is that China would prefer war to accepting the French terms. She can pour 50,000 troops at once into the south, armed with breech-loaders, fairly drilled, and officers are being sought in England and America. The French troops, on the other hand, have a short season for operations, a bad climate, and are too few. The parties to the dispute have irritated each other by demands hopelessly irreconcilable, and it is believed that mediation now would have no good effect.

The Ominous Cloud on the Danube has not passed away. Indeed, the rupture between Bulgaria and Russia has passed into the acute form. The Czar, irritated by the independent course of the prince of the country, administered a reproof by recalling the Russian aides-de-camp. Prince Alexander instead of tendering his submission, as was expected, promptly and peremptorily dismissed all the other Russian officers. The officers, uncertain which of their two masters they ought to obey, refused to surrender their places until the prince's order is confirmed by the Czar. The quarrel is small, but any agitation in that quarter of the globe causes uneasiness throughout Europe.

The Hopes of Irish Nationalists that Home Rule for Ireland might yet be granted by the English Radicals have been disappointed by a recent speech delivered by Mr. Leatham in Yorkshire. Mr. Leatham is Mr. Bright's brother-in-law and follower, and is one of the most influential Radicals. He declares that the Liberals will persist in a policy of absolute and unfaltering justice to Ireland, but will not entertain the idea of dissolving the Union. He affirms that though sincere in his attachment to the Liberal party, and warm in his allegiance to its leaders, he would renounce both sooner than admit the possibility of conceding Home Rule.

Renewed Nihilist Activity is Manifested in Russia. The latest nihilist proclamation is being extensively circulated. It demands that the Czar summon the representatives of the Russian people, and asks for full amnesty, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and the right to hold public meetings as the only means of preventing a revolution. Pitiless vengeance is threatened, if the demands of the order are disregarded. The nihilists have been stirred up by learning the barbarities with which one of their number has been treated. A prisoner named Netschajeff was condemned ten years ago and was supposed to be dead; but he is alive, and a letter purporting to be written by him has been received and is published in the nihilist journal. The writer complains of the inhumanity of the prison officials and of the terrible treatment to which he and his fellow-prisoners are subjected. He says that he has recently been deprived of the little light hitherto allowed him. The journal adds that the letter was originally written in blood on a printed piece of paper, and a great portion therefore is illegible.

The Arrangements for Messrs. Moody and Sankey's meetings in London are announced in the English journals. The evangelists arrived in Ireland on October 9th, and on the following day began a brief campaign at Limerick, where they remained until October 15th. From the 16th to the 26th they were to be at Cork; and at Waterford from the 28th to the 31st. Their visit to London may extend over six months. Without any public appeal the sum of $30,000 has been subscribed by a few friends to meet preliminary expenses. The services will be held in movable iron halls, each capable of seating 5000 persons. The first of these structures is already built, and ready for occupation, on a green spot close to Highbury, a London suburb, and a second hall is in course of erection at Wandsworth. The services at Islington will commence on the 4th of November, and terminate on the 19th. Messrs. Moody and Sankey will then go to Wandsworth, for it is the intention to alternate between the north and south sides of the Thames. As soon as the evangelists betake themselves to Wandsworth, the hall at Islington will be taken down and run up at Stepney, on a site cleared for the purpose, in one of the lowest quarters in the east of London. Then in turn the Wandsworth hall will be removed to Clapham. The halls being smaller than those in use on the occasion of the previous visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, an effort will be made to prevent the attendance of people who may be desirous of following the evangelists from place to place. Tickets will be distributed in the immediate locality of the hall for the benefit of residents, and the holders will have the preference of admission.

Mr. T. E. Murphy, the son of Mr. Francis Murphy, is still laboring in Ireland under the auspices of the Irish Temperance League. During September he conducted missions in Cookstown and Limerick, and addressed crowded meetings in Maghera, Coleraine, Ballyroney, Lisburn, Garvagh, Dungannon, Aughnacloy, Ballymoney, Dunadry, Antrim, and Cork, with great success. In October he addressed meetings in Dunmurry, Antrim, Carrickfergus, Maghera, Kilrea, Aghadowey, and Pomeroy. So great is the demand for the services of the Young American orator that arrangements were made for him to conduct a four days' mission in Londonderry, which terminated on October 19th. Prayer meetings were held each day, conducted by Mr. Murphy, and he addressed a public meeting each night.

The Jewish Refugee Colony at Zimmarin, Palestine, appears to be in a deplorable condition. Dr. Schmidt, the British Vice-Consul at Caiffa, Syria, says that "the colonists are literally dying of hunger. They implore assistance." Another writer says: "In the colony of Rosh Pinah the want of funds wherewith to develop their resources is serious. In the case of Zimmarin more families have been sent there than the land is capable of supporting, and the assistance they had been led to expect from the Central Roumanian Committee of Galatz is no longer forthcoming. The whole question of the success of these colonies depends on their receiving judicious organized assistance at starting. Unless it is soon forthcoming it will be too late. I still hope that on attention being drawn to the subject the matter may be taken in hand. It will be a thousand pities if this movement, which bids fair to exercise a regenerating influence on the Jews of Palestine, so many of whom have hitherto led lives of sloth and mendicancy, be allowed to be crushed for want of a little timely assistance."

Standard Recitations by the Best Authors, compiled by Frances P. Sullivan, is a book recently issued by Messrs. M. J. Ivers & Co. It contains seventy-nine pieces extracted from the works of J. G. Whittier, H. W. Longfellow, Tennyson, Shelley, Browning, etc., etc. They are specially adapted for recitation at school, and public or private entertainments. Forty-eight pages in paper cover, twelve cents, including postage. Purchasers may send one cent or two cent postage stamps, but not postage stamps of any other denomination.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. THE portrait on the first page of this number is of a clergyman almost as highly esteemed on this side the Atlantic as on that where he labored for more than half a century in the cause of Christ. The news of the death of Dr. Begg, which was brought by cable a month ago, seemed to many a family here a personal bereavement; some remembered his visit here in 1845 and listened to his stirring addresses, others had made his acquaintance in his own country, while many more, who had never seen or heard him, had learned to honor the brave preacher, who valued neither place nor fortune when his conscience required their relinquishment.

James Begg was born in Lanarkshire, Scotland, on October 31st, 1808, and was therefore nearly seventy-five years of age when he died. His father was the parish minister of New Monkland, and the first twelve years of his life were spent under his parents' roof, and his early education was obtained at the parish-school. Having given evidence of a change of heart through the power of the Holy Spirit, the desire of the earnest youth was to enter the ministry of the Church of Scotland, and at an age at which very few lads now enter a university he was sent to Glasgow, and continued his studies at the old college there. His progress was very rapid, and by the time he had attained his sixteenth year he graduated in Arts with distinction.

After he had acted for some time as tutor to a family residing at Morningside, near Edinburgh, the Presbytery of Hamilton licensed him to preach on June 10th, 1829. He was then twenty-one years of age. His eagerness to enter upon active ministerial work made him resolve to accept the first call that might be presented to him. His was made at Duddingston Church, where he preached forenoon and afternoon on that day, and in the evening walked to Edinburgh and delivered a third discourse in what was then known as the Canongate Chapel. On the following morning he was asked to become assistant to the late Dr. James Buchanan, of North Leith. The association with so eminent a preacher as Dr. Buchanan appeared to him sufficiently advantageous to counterbalance the larger remuneration he could obtain elsewhere. He therefore accepted the offer, and preached in the church every Sunday afternoon. His duties under Dr. Buchanan included a weekly service at Newhaven on Tuesday evenings, and the visitation of the parishioners residing in the Peatneuk District of Leith, a quarter then notorious alike for the depravity and the poverty of its denizens. But he was not destined to remain long in this subordinate position. In a short time he received the appointment to the pastorate of

MAXWELLTOWN CHURCH,

Dumfries. He was the first minister of that church, being ordained on May 18th, 1830; but by his zeal and ability and the popularity of his preaching he soon gathered a large congregation, and quickly filled a building which held about eleven hundred people.

While in Maxwelltown he visited Jean Armour, the poet Burns's widow, who was one of his parishioners. He found her an "exceedingly interesting and thoroughly good woman." Her well-thumbed Bible he generally found on her table, a volume the old lady read constantly, and would not be induced to sell though a high price might be obtained for it, as it contained the family record inscribed therein in the handwriting of Burns himself. The widow and her grandchildren attended church frequently to hear Mr. Begg, who, notwithstanding his otherwise high opinon of her, saw no traces of that beauty of which her poet-husband sang. "Nobody would ever have imagined," said he, "that she had been bonnie; it would have required a stretch of imagination to discover anything of the sort."

From Dumfries the young minister was, in 1831, removed to Lady Glenorchy's Church, Edinburgh, as colleague of the late Dr. Jones. He had found that the great efforts he had put forth at Dumfries were telling prejudicially on his health, and he therefore welcomed the opportunity which brought him less labor and easier circumstances. The congregation of the Middle Parish, Paisley, next claimed and secured his services; and in 1832, while minister of that parish, he for the first time became a representative to the General Assembly of the then undivided Church of Scotland. That year's assembly was a memorable one in the annals of the Church's history; for in it was sounded the first note of that severe conflict which resulted in what, according to the shade of ecclesiastical opinion entertained, is variously termed "Disruption" and "Secession." A proposal was made in that meeting of the Assembly to appoint a committee to inquire into the working of the Patronage Act, by which ungodly but wealthy patrons appointed ministers over parishes; and in the discussion that followed upon that proposal, and in almost every stage of leading to the disruption of the Free Presbyterian Church from the Established Presbyterian Church which followed, Mr. Begg's voice was heard, and his power and influence felt, on the platform and in the Presbytery and the other Courts of the Church.

Mr. Begg's ardor, enthusiasm, and ability as a platform speaker soon gave him a prominent position in the ranks of the controversialists, though these embraced such men of power as Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Candlish, Dr. Cunningham, and Dr. Guthrie. He was marked out by the leaders as a young man of power; and their appreciative estimate of his merits was subsequently amply justified.

In 1835 he was translated to Liberton, under circumstances which were thus described by himself: "My excellent friend, Dr. Jones, lived at Liberton Tower, and I went there to spend the Sabbath with him. It so happened that the minister of Liberton, then a young man, only one year there, became unwell, and the people hearing that I was at Dr. Jones's house, came and asked me to preach, which I readily did. The worthy minister died immediately afterward, and the people determined to do what they could to get me as their pastor. In those days, however, patronage was paramount, but it so happened that there was a political election going on at the time, and the people of Liberton having it very much in their power to turn the election, they went to Sir John Clerk and said, 'Get this man appointed for us as our minister; if not, we'll not vote for you.' That was the way I came to be minister of Liberton."

POPULARITY AT LIBERTON.

So popular was Mr. Begg at this time with the parishioners that all classes and persons of all creeds attended his ministry. It is said that when he settled at Liberton there were thirty-three drinking bars in the parish, in which 9000 gallons of spirits were annually consumed, at a cost of $22,500. In a statement which he issued, Mr. Begg pointed to this as the cause of the prevailing poverty, and the result was seven of the houses were closed; while the poor of the parish were well provided for by the church-door collection, distributed by the elders under the supervision of the minister. At the end of eight years, however, that is, in 1843, the Disruption took place, and he renounced this, which was one of the richest rural livings in the Church of Scotland.

It was his opinion, when Disruption was first spoken of, that such an extreme course should not be resorted to, but that the party with which he was connected should remain in the Church, and direct their energies to obtain the reforms which, as they believed, were urgently needed. His views were, however, overborne by other counsels; and ultimately he concurred with those who believed that Disruption was the only effective way of protesting against the "Erastianism" (or appointment of ministers by secular patrons) they had been combating. To leave the Church was, however, a severe trial to a man of Mr. Begg's views and temperament, and how keenly he felt it only his more intimate friends ever knew. His love for the Church of Scotland, as by law established, was strong and deep-seated; and all that subsequently happened did not eradicate this attachment.

VISITS THE UNITED STATES.

After the Disruption, Dr. Begg, with other leaders, made a pilgrimage through Scotland, supplying ordinances to Free Church congregations who, as yet, had no ministers; and he afterward went with Dr. Candlish, Dr Guthrie, Dr. Cunningham, and others, as a deputation to confer with the English Presbyterians. The ecclesiastical controversy had long ere this found its way to the Canadian backwoods and the homes of Scottish colonists in America and Australia. Pastorals were accordingly sent out by the Free Church to the colonial Synods; and these, in the case of Canada, were supported in 1845 by an influential deputation, which reported on its return that it had everywhere been received with enthusiasm. Of this deputation Mr. Begg was a leading member. In the course of his American travels he preached before Congress; and from Lafayette College, Pennsylvania, he received the degree of D.D.

In the "site controversy," which resulted from the Disruption, in consequence of many landlords refusing sites for Free Churches, Dr. Begg was again a prominent figure; and he used to tell how, at Applecross and Shieldaig in 1845, he to thousands of Highlanders, the sound of whose voices joining in tuneful psalm mingled with the roar of the Atlantic. (See frontispiece.)

MINISTRY IN EDINBURGH.

At the time of Dr. Begg's removal to Edinburgh the southern suburb of that city was, to a large extent, grass-land. In selecting the Newington site, he gave offence to certain leading members of his old congregation, who thought Upper Gray Street would prove a more suitable situation; but events proved that even in this matter he had shown the practical sagacity which all along distinguished him. Not only did he contribute largely toward the cost of the church, but he was mainly instrumental in raising the remainder of the money, while he also built a manse in Cumin Place. Twice during his ministry the church had to be enlarged. As at Liberton, Dr. Begg adopted the system of free sittings, leaving the congregation to contribute as they thought fit for the maintenance of ordinances; and so satisfactorily has this plan worked, that from first to last the people using the seats have subscribed no less than $250,000.

THE TIDE OF ROMANISM.

The action of the Pope in 1850 in regard to the revival of the Papal Hierarchy in England brought Dr. Begg, a doughty champion of Protestantism, to the front of an agitation which swept over the country, and the outcome of which in Edinburgh was the establishment of the Scottish Reformation Society, the formation of the Irish Church Mission for Romanists, and the starting of the Bulwark and Reformation Journal, of which Dr. Begg was editor for twenty-one years, and which reached a circulation of over 30,000 copies. Dr. Begg's Hand- book of Popery, which is regarded by many Protestants as a standard work on the subject, has had a circulation of upward of 150,000, and is still in demand.

INTEREST IN THE WORKING CLASSES.

In all matters relating to the welfare of the working classes Dr. Begg manifested a warm interest, and it was largely owing to his advocacy of the desirableness of providing better dwellings for industrious artisans that the Edinburgh Co-operative Building Company was formed. The Company, managed entirely by working men, has occupied ground at the rate of two acres per annum for more than twenty years, has sold in the same period over 1300 houses for the working classes, has received in payment for such property over a quarter of a million sterling, and has annually divided among its shareholders profits averaging something like twelve per cent.

While never venturing into the higher walks of literature, Dr. Begg was probably the author of more pamphlets dealing with questions in which he took an interest than any other man of his generation. The number has been set down by one well qualified to form an estimate at not less than 150 pamphlets, among them being the "Health of Ministers." Dr. Begg was also a contributor to a volume of "Family Devotions," but comparatively few of his sermons have been published.

MODERATOR OF ASSEMBLY.

Dr. Begg's position in the Free Church was duly recognized in his election as Moderator of the Assembly in May, 1865. Among other noteworthy incidents of his long and active life may be mentioned a trip he made in 1873 to Egypt, India, Australia, New Zealand, and America, in all which countries he was received by Scotch colonists in the most friendly manner. In New Zealand—where one of his sons is an extensive landholder—the reception accorded was particularly cordial. On the doctor's return, his public services were acknowledged by the presentation to him, in the Literary Institute, of a testimonial amounting to $25,000.

In May, 1880, Dr. Begg completed the fiftieth year of ministerial life, and advantage was taken of the occasion by his congregation to present him with an address of congratulation and other tokens of esteem.

LAST WORKS, WORDS, AND DEATH.

The news of his death on September 29th was received in Edinburgh and throughout Scotland with a shock of painful surprise. It was, indeed, hard to realize that one whose appearance was so suggestive of bodily vigor, and who, but a week before, could speak of himself as enjoying wonderfully good health, should so suddenly have passed away. Those brought into close contact with Dr. Begg, however, had latterly observed symptoms which seemed to forebode a break-down. Only the other week he dropped down upon the pavement on leaving the bookwarehouse of Mr. Gemmell, George IV. Bridge, Edinburgh (one of the elders of Newington Free Church), where he was almost a daily visitor, and a day or two later a similar mishap befell him in entering a cab after attending a funeral in Preston Street Churchyard.

He occupied his own pulpit at both services on Sunday, September 23d, preaching in the afternoon, singularly enough, from the text, "And as it is appointed unto men once to die." On the following day he went to North Berwick, where he seems to have contracted a cold. Returning to town on Wednesday, he occupied his wonted place at a meeting of the Free Presbytery, and took a leading part in connection with the disposal of the business that had to be transacted. He was then suffering from hoarseness, but otherwise seemed as robust as he had generally appeared of late. On the following day he was confined to the house, and his medical attendant found him suffering from cartarrhal pulmonary attack, which developed into congestion of the lungs. On Friday, September 28th, he felt somewhat better, but had a restless night, and a good deal of sickness, and on Saturday it became evident that he was rapidly approaching his end. Shortly after four o'clock he fell asleep in Christ, having continued conscious until within half an hour of his death.

His funeral took place on October 3d in Newington Cemetery, the resting-place of his wife, when thousands followed him to his grave.

Thus has passed away from the scene of his earthly sacrifices, efforts and successes in the service of Christ, a Prince in Israel, with many to mourn his loss, not only in the Church which by noble and vigorous life he adorned, but also to lovers of scriptural truth the world over. But while the church on earth mourns the loss of the valiant soldiers of Christ, they pass into that Presence in which there is "fulness of joy."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Gold in the Quartz.—At a Recent Meeting the Rev. James Scott said: "When I was in California, an old Scotchwoman brought me a piece of quartz in which was imbedded a small piece of gold, saying, 'Mr. Scott, I would like you to see how our heavenly Father stores up the gold for our use.' There it was sparkling in the midst of a bit of useless rock. So ought we to cherish the Word of life till our lives shine and sparkle so that men will see that we are real Christians."

A Shop in a Woman's Head.—The Rev. Mr. McLachlan mentioned in one of the meetings that: "In St. Martyr's Free Church, he spoke to a woman in a respectable position, having a large shop in the Townhead. In reply to my inquiry, 'Are you a Christian?' she replied, 'Yes, thank God, I am. Since I came to these meetings I have become a changed woman, the very walls of my house are different. When I lock up my shop on Saturday night, I do not think of it now till the Monday. Before, the shop was always in my head, but Christ is in my heart, and my best thoughts are engaged with Him.'"

A Jew Emigrant Finding Christ.—Mr. Baron, the missionary to the Jews in Glasgow, said: "We hear of some of the results of our work in a roundabout way sometimes. In a Baltimore paper, a pastor tells of a young Jew who got a New Testament at one of our British ports when sailing recently for America. During the voyage he read about Christ, and finally believed that He was in truth the promised Messiah of the Old Testament. The place from which he came was never visited by any Christian missionary, therefore, unless he had been forced to emigrate, he would never have heard of Jesus. He is living an exemplary Christian life in the midst of his Jewish compatriots in Baltimore."

A Straight Road to Hell.—The Rev. Mr. Hutcheson said: "There may be some here who think they occupy an intermediate state. They are not sinners like Satan, neither are they religious fanatics like such another one, but are good, moral people who go to church regularly, attend the Communion at the stated periods, and subscribe as little as they dare to charitable schemes. For seventeen years I occupied this intermediate state, but was going as straight down to hell as any one ever was, till the Holy Spirit opened my eyes, and showed me my lost condition. Praise the Lord, I saw Jesus as my personal Saviour, and rejoice in Him constantly."

No Other Chance but This.—"An Incident which happened when I was a boy at school will make clear to you that there is often a last chance for salvation which, if missed, can never be got again in this life. A burn or brook runs through the village in which I lived, descending straight from the mountains. Usually it was small and shallow, but after heavy rains or when the snow was melting, it became almost a river, and came down with great fury, carrying roots and trunks of trees from the mountain side. At these times men and boys used to try to bring the timber ashore for firewood. One boy had a rope, trying to catch a large root, but failed; another boy standing near, said, 'Gie me it, and I'll bring it in.' With a dextrous throw he caught the root, but the current was too strong, and dragged him into the foaming water. Every effort was made to save him, but he was swept down to a bend in the stream, which was covered with overhanging trees. A youth who saw it was the boy's last chance, shouted, 'Catch hold of the branches!' He did so, and was saved. If he had not done so, he would have been lost for this world—there was no other chance for him. My cry to the unconverted and Christless who are floating on the downward stream is, 'Lay hold of the only hope; lay hold of Christ and He will save thee.'"

Breaking a Window to Get Bread.—At a meeting in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, the Rev. J. F. Ewing said: "A year ago I was staying in Berlin. Much want existed among the laboring classes. Individual cases of acute distress were lost in the crowd of starving people. One man, who was actually dying of starvation, realized this, and knew that if he became a criminal, he would attract attention to his case. He went to the finest and largest street in the city, and drove his foot through a large plate-glass window. His case was soon made public, and though he obtained bread, he had to suffer the penalty of his crime. God, in His infinite mercy, has provided a way whereby we may escape, not only from distress, and obtain for food the very bread of heaven; but also enjoy rest and peace. That way is the Lord Jesus Christ."

A Chinese Leper Evangelist.—At a Noon prayer-meeting, Mr. McMicking said: "A poor leper in China went into one of the mission hospitals, but was discharged as incurable. He had heard the Gospel preached, and received it as a gift from God. He went home to his native village, two and a half days' journey from Swatow, and began to testify to the love of Jesus. Rumors of some great work being done in this hamlet reached the missionaries, and they sent some native teachers, who found twenty or thirty men and women who professed to be converted through the efforts of this poor distorted leper. They also noticed a strange expression of peace on his disfigured features. God can, and does, employ the most unlikely agencies to carry on His work and effectually secure His glory."

A Visit to a Judge.—"When I was a Student I visited Lord Ardilaun, one of the judges in the Court of Session. In private life he was the most genial man I ever met, and most kind and tender-hearted. When he sat on the bench he was inflexible. Why? Because he could not help himself. When the evidence convinced the jury that a prisoner had committed murder, and they returned their verdict of 'guilty,' he had to put on the black cap, and pass sentence of death upon the murderer. 'God is love; God is merciful,' says a man or woman who is unwilling to give up some darling sin. Take up His cross and follow Jesus. God is both these; but He is also a Judge, who cannot clear the guilty, they must be punished, or find a substitute, and the only substitute acceptable with the Father is Jesus, His well-beloved Son, who died to save us."

A Timely Word to Students.—The Rev. Mr. Andrew said: "When I was a student in the Old University in High Street, Glasgow, as few of us had prayer-meetings regularly, after some discussion we thought it our duty to get some man, who was specially blessed by God to the salvation of souls, to visit us, and hold Gospel services. We invited the late Brownlow North, and had Ewing Place Independent Church crowded with young men. In his sermon Mr. North said: 'Oh, young men, if you are training to become ministers and propose to occupy a parish, and yet are unconverted, not only will you be cumberers of the ground, but you will be keeping out some man of God who could bring forth fruit.' I prayed then with all my heart, 'Forbid, Lord, that I should occupy any place whatever which another man can fill better.'"

RELIGION AN ANTISEPTIC.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, November 4, 1883.

"Every sacrifice shall be salted with salt. Salt is good: but if the salt have lost his saltness, where with will ye season it?"—MARK 9: 49, 50.

THE Bible is a dictionary of the finest similes. Among trees it employs the terebinth, the sycamore, the cedar, the apple. Among living creatures the stork, the eagle, the unicorn, and all sheep and cattle. Among jewels the jacinth and the emerald and the sapphire and the chrysoprasus. Christ used no stale illustrations. The lilies in His sermon were not pressed flowers, but dewy fresh plucked up from the grass. The ravens in His sermon were not stuffed specimens of birds, but warm with life from wing-tip to wing-tip. The fish to which He pointed in His discourse were not dull about the gills, showing that they had long been captured, but all asquirm in the wet net just hauled up on the beach of Genessaret. Christ, in the text, lifts a crystal of salt before His audience, and says: "The divine grace is like this salt," saying what you and I know by experience, "salt is good."

I. I shall this morning try to carry out the Saviour's idea, while in the first place I say that, in its beauty. In Galicia, among the mines of salt, there are two hundred and eighty miles of underground passages. Down in those salt mines there are chapels and cathedrals and theatres and halls of reception, and the altars are of crystal, and the columns are of crystal, and the ceiling is of crystal. When the emperor comes and the princes, all this is lighted up with torches, and the scene is indescribable for beauty, as the emperor and the mighty men of his realm walk through, and some of them worship in the chancels, and others are entertained in the theatres, and all the floor, all the pillars, all the ceilings are of crystal. But why should I go so far to tell you of the beauty of salt when you can take a morning train and go to the salt mines in a few hours? You have it three times a day upon your table.

It is beautiful to the naked eye, but put under the microscope you see the stars and the splinters and the shafts and the bridges of fire glint of the sun. Salt has all the beauty of water foam and snow flake with durability added. No human skill hath ever put in Alhambra or St. Peter's such marvellous beauty as God hath put in one crystal of salt. An angel would need to take all of time with an infringement upon eternity to sketch the beauty of that which you sometimes cast aside as of no importance.

So I have to tell you that the grace of God is BEAUTIFUL AND BEAUTIFYING.

Have you never seen a life illumined by it? Have you never seen a soul comforted by it? Have you never seen a character grandly constructed through it? I have seen it smooth the wrinkles of care from the brow. I have seen it seemingly change the aged into the young. I have seen it lift the stooped shoulder and put sparkle into the dull eye. It is beautifying in its results. It is grand and glorious in its influence. Solomon described its anatomical effect when he said: "It is marrow to the bones."

Of course, I refer now to a healthy religion, not that kind which sits for three hours on a gravestone reading Hervey's "Meditations among the Tombs"—a kind of religion which always thrives best in a bad state of the liver; but a religion such as Christ preached, the healthiest thing in all the earth, good for the body as well as good for the soul, for it calms the pulses, and it soothes the nerves, and it quiets the spleen, and it is a physical reinvigoration. Many a man has felt it. I suppose when the grace of God has triumphed in all the earth disease will be banished, and that a man one hundred years of age will come into the house, and say: "I am very tired, and it is time for me to go," and without one physical pang heaven will have him.

When I was living in Philadelphia there was an aged bank president; he was somewhere in the nineties. At the close of the business of the day, he came home, lay down on the sofa, and said to his daughter: "My time has come, and I must go away from you." "Why," she said, "father, are you sick? shall I send for a doctor?" "Oh, no," he replied, "I am not sick, but the time has come for me to go. You have it put in the morning papers about my death, so that they will not expect me in business circles." And instantly he ceased to breathe. That was beautiful—that was a glorious transition from the world. And the time will come when men will leave the world without a pang.

The grace of God is going to do just as much for the bodies of men as it does for the souls of men. But I think the power of religion is chiefly seen in the soul. It takes that which is hard and cold and repulsive and casts it out. It makes a man all over again. It takes his pride and his selfishness and his worldliness and chains them—chains them fast so that they can move around with very small sweep, for they are chained. Oh, what glorious things it did for

THE THREE JOHNS.

John Bunyan, the foul-mouthed—it made John Bunyan the immortal dreamer. John Newton, cursing on the ship's deck when the storm came on, denouncing God and the tempest—before the cyclone had passed, kneeling in prayer, saying: "O God of my mother, have mercy on me." It led John Summerfield out of a life of sin, and by the hand of a Christian edge-tool maker he was led into the pulpit, which has been burnished with his eloquence for Christ—that Christ whom he once despised.

Go all through the underground falls of Weilitzka and through the underground kingdoms of Holstadt and show me anything so beautiful, so grandly beautiful as this eternal crystal. It throws a beauty over the heart and a beauty over the life. Christ comes into the soul and casts on it the glow of a summer garden, as He says: "I am the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley." And then He comes and throws all over the life and the heart the beauty of a spring morning, as He cries out: "I am the light of the world." Oh, is there in all the earth, is there in all the heavens anything so beautiful as the grace of God?

II. I remark still further: Grace is like salt in the fact that it is

A NECESSITY OF LIFE.

Beasts and men die without it. What are those paths across the western prairie? They have been made by the deer and buffalo coming to and going from the salt licks. All chemists, all physiologists, all physicians will tell you that salt is an absolute necessity for physical health and life. Without it we soon die. And I came to understand also that this grace of God is an absolute necessity. I hear people talk of it as though this religion were a mere adornment, a shoulder-strap decorating a soldier, a frothy, light dessert after the chief banquet has passed, something to be tried after calomels and mustard plasters have failed, but in ordinary circumstances of no especial importance—only the jingling of the bells on the horse's neck while he draws the load, but in no way helping him to draw it. Now I denounce that style of religion. Religion, while it is an adornment, is the first and the last necessity of an immortal nature. I must have it, you must have it, or we cannot live.

You know how a man would soon perish if he took no salt with his food. The energies would flag, the lungs would struggle with the air, slow fevers would crawl through the brain, the heart would flutter, and the life would be gone. And that is what is the matter with a great many people who are dying in their souls. They take none of this salt of divine grace. They have never tried it. They do not want it. Weaker and weaker will they get in the spiritual life, until after a while they will be stretched out on the bier of death. Coffin him in a groan. Hearse him in a sigh. Throw a wreath of nightshade on the casket. Kindle no lamp at the head or the foot, but rather set up the expired torches of the foolish virgins whose lamps went out. Salt an absolute necessity for the life of the body; the grace of God an absolute necessity for the life of the soul. Oh, that it might thunder in our ears to-day: "Except ye be born again ye cannot, ye cannot see the kingdom of God."

III. I remark again, that grace like salt is

IN ABUNDANCE.

Russia stands on a great salt cellar, ninety thousand tons of it annually coming from there. Norway and Sweden white with snow above, white with salt beneath. England and Italy have large resources in this respect. Austria turns out nine hundred thousand tons annually. Oh, what vast abundance! That is just like this grace of God. Enough for all lands, for all people, for all conditions. It seems to undergird the earth. Pardon for the worst sin, comfort for the darkest trouble, peace for the most perturbed spirit, in vast abundance.

I am told that ten thousand men work day and night around about the salt lakes of Saratoy, and yet they never exhaust the saline waters. And I have to tell you that if the fourteen hundred millions of the race should this moment cry out for God's mercy they would get it. Enough for one, enough for all. Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, and all the islands of the sea might wade down into this ocean of God's mercy, and there would be room enough to wash and come up clean.

Have you ever tried to measure the height, the depth, the length, the breadth of that one word which we toss from the lips as though it were of no importance? "Whosoever." So high, so long, so broad, so deep is this salvation. "Whosoever." "Whosoever will let him come." Oh, the abundance of it! Do you think your case is too tough for the Lord to deal with? You say that the torrent of your life sin is so deep and raging. Then I tell you this grace of God is a bridge, not built on earthly piers, but suspended, one end of it resting on the rock of the eternal promises, and the other end of it on the foundations of heaven.

Demetrius, the king, wore a robe so incrusted with jewels that after his death nobody dared to put it on. But I have to tell you that Christ, our King, takes off His robe of righteousness, blood-dyed and heaven-impearled, and holds it forth to the worst wretch on earth, saying: "Take it, put it on, wear it, wear it now, wear it forever." Oh, the abundance of this grace!

We have got to have more faith in this Gospel, in its power to save all classes of people, not only those high up, but those low down, not only the wise, but the ignorant—all classes. It is going to regenerate society. While we sit in holy places to-day, how many thousands there are who have no Sabbath. They pass down these streets. They know not it is the Sabbath, except that it gives them more opportunity for dissipation and wicked hilarity, and more time for sin. They have got to be brought under the power of this Gospel. It is an abundant Gospel. The Christ that saved you will save them.

IN A CITY PRISON.

Some years ago, a city pastor in New York was called to a city prison to attend the obsequies. He came there. A woman had been incarcerated for some great crime, a young woman. Her mother had come to visit her, and had died while there, and as the mother had no home the obsequies were from the city prison. After a while the young woman, who had been imprisoned, said to the minister of religion, 'Wouldn't you like to see my mother?' So the face was uncovered. Standing there the minister of religion said: "Don't you feel to-day, in the presence of your dead mother, like resolving upon something better? Don't you feel in this presence as if you would like to start for God and heaven?" Then she pulled from her hand a worn-out glove, which she had on in honor of the obsequies. It was the best she had. She pulled off that worn-out glove, and the hand made bare, she put it upon the cold brow of the dead mother, and said: "In the help of God I swear that I will do differently, and I will begin now." Years after she was telling the story. She said: "When that minister of religion said to me, 'God help you in your vow,' I thought to myself, 'Why, that is the first prayer I have heard in ten years,' and

THAT PRAYER SAVED ME.

Ever since I have tried to live a Christian life." Oh, the power of this grace! Oh, the strength of the Almighty arms able to save all, however high, however low! "Whosoever!" "Whosoever!"

IV. But I remark, that grace is like salt in

THE WAY WE GET AT IT.

Salt on the surface of the earth is for the most part impure and of no value—such as on the South American pampas and on the Rocky Mountains, and in some parts of India, it is on the top of the ground very impure. But the miners go down through the shafts and along by the dark labyrinths and amid the galleries of rock, on and down until they come under the very foundations of the earth. There they find the salt. They bring it forth for the wealth of the nations. If they want to find a salt spring they bore down into the earth, down deeper, down deeper, down until under the roots of the everlasting mountains they strike the spring, and then the waters, the saline waters come out through the aqueducts for the wealth of the people. And I have to tell you that this grace of God is to be profoundly sought after. You will not stumble across it. Superficial exploration will not find it. You will have to dig for it. With all the energy of body, mind, and soul you will have to dig for it. You will have to go down to the very lowest strata of earnestness and faith to find it.

But these waters are placed after a while where takes place. The saline waters are put into a tank where the sun makes quick evaporation. Or the boilers are fiercely heated, and then the evaporation takes place. And I have to tell you now that when a soul is brought under the influence of the Sun of righteousness, pride and worldliness and selfishness and all the vapors of the soul float away, and there is left the white holiness of the heart. And then as the furnaces are brought in the case of the salt, so the furnace is brought in the case of the soul. The smutted stokers of darkness stir the blaze, the furnace of trial becomes hotter and hotter and hotter, and so the evaporation of worldliness is hastened, and the crystallization of grace. Have not some of you passed through enough trouble to have that process go on?

I have read how that Aristotle said that there was in Sicily so sweet that hounds in search of game, and on the track, would come up to that field, and so great were the perfumes they bewildered them and threw them off the track. Oh, that our souls might be the field that the Lord hath blessed and that they might exhale so much sweetness of divine grace that the hounds of trouble and death coming on the track might lose it and go howling back in disappointment.

"Oh," says some one out there, "if I am to be saved I will be saved, and if I am to be lost I will be lost." You misrepresent the Gospel, my brother. Do not say that. There is something for you to do. Strive to enter in at the straight gate. Take the kingdom of heaven by violence.

V. This grace is also like salt in its

PRESERVATIVE QUALITY.

You know that salt absorbs the moisture of food, and so food is preserved. Salt is the great anti-putrefactive of the world. Everybody knows that. Experimenters in the preservation of food have tried sugar and smoke and air-tight jars and everything; but as long as the world stands Christ's remark will be suggestive: "Salt is good." And this grace of God is to be the preservative of laws, of constitutions, of government. Why is it that the United States Government and the British Government have stood so long? While there has been corruption often in high places, there have been good men always in the front. Take the grace of God away from a nation and you work its destruction. It cannot live without it.

So a great deal of modern philosophy. What is the matter with it? The grace of God has gone out of it, and it putrefies and rots. What our schools of learning, what our institutions of science want now is not more Leyden jars, more galvanic batteries, more spectroscopes, more philosophic apparatus. Oh, no. What is most wanted is the grace of God to teach our men of learning that the God of the universe is the God of the Bible. Is it not strange that with all their magnificent sweeps of the telescopes they have never seen the morning star of Jesus? or having been so long studying about light and heat they have never seen and felt the light and heat of the sun of righteousness that has risen on the world with healing in His wings? O my friends, the Gospel of the grace of God is the only anti-putrefactive among the nations. Take that away, you take their life away. Everything on earth is tending to decay and death. This is the preserving quality. "Salt is good."

Are there not those here to-day who need that preventive grace, this preservative quality? There are some of you already gone wrong. They know a great deal better than I can tell them how they need this preserving quality of divine grace. I have wondered sometimes if other pastors have had come under their observation so many sad cases as I have seen since I have lived here in Brooklyn, so many illustrations of the fact that men in this great sea-board life, the preserving grace of God. Right at this point in the aisle (pointing to the front of the platform) at the close of a service a man said to me in great agitation: "When can I see you alone?" I said: "Now," and we stepped aside. I said: "What is the matter?" He replied: "I have taken $2500 in small sums—but amounting to $2500—from my business firm, of which I am the confidential clerk. What shall I do?" I said: "Pay it back." He said: "I can't pay it back." "Well," I said, "get some of your friends to help you pay it back." He said: "My friends can't pay it. What shall I do?"

"Well," I said, "my advice to you is very distinct, my brother. I give you two prescriptions. The first is: Go home and kneel down before God and ask His forgiveness. Then to-morrow morning you go over to the store and invite the head men of the firm into the private office, telling them you have something of great importance to reveal to them, and have the door locked, and then you confess the whole thing, and if they are decent men—to say nothing of whether they are Christians or not—if they are decent men they will not be hard on you." "But," said he, "suppose they won't do that?" "Then," I said, "you have the Almighty God to fall back upon, and He never forsook a man who put his trust in Him, and God will see you through." Standing there it seemed as if my heart would break for that man in such awful predicament of sin. He did not have the preservative quality of divine grace in his soul to keep him from the temptations of Brooklyn and New York life.

Oh, young men,

YOU NEED CHRIST.

You need Him now. Is it not a matter of congratulation to all those who have this antiseptic in your heart? God is going to preserve you all through the sorrows of this life, and He is going to preserve you to eternity. I do not promise you will have no trouble because you are Christian. On the contrary, I promise you if you do your duty you will have a great deal of trouble, but God, I think, will see you through. I think He will. But why should I talk like an atheist when I know He will. "Kept by the power of God through faith unto complete salvation." I know He will. Come, then, with your wounds to Christ. I would like to be the Lord's surgeon a little while. Fetch all your wounds of soul. Just fetch them now to Christ, and I will be the Lord's surgeon. I have been told there is nothing to stop the bleeding of a wound like salt if it be well applied. Just fetch up the wounds of your soul now, and I will put this salt of divine grace on the lacerations. It smarts a little at the first, it smarts very much at the first. But see, the bleeding of the wound is stopped, and the flesh is coming together as the flesh of a little child. "Salt is good!"

A PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE FROM A PRECIPICE.

THE belief in a special Providence is rather out of fashion in this day, men apparently preferring to believe that God has set the world in motion, has established laws to govern it, and has since stood aside and refrained from interfering in its affairs. The Christian whose faith in the efficacy of prayer is unabated and who believes that God watches over the lives of His people, entertains no such thought. There are many incidents on record which confirm his view, and it is well in these days of shifting faith that they should be widely known. One of these is depicted in the illustration on page 716.

In John Wesley's diary under date of June 20th, 1744, the following narrative is given: "About nine I set out for Horsley with Mr. Hopper and Mr. Smith. I took Mrs. Smith and her two little girls in the chaise with me. About two miles from the town, just on the brow of the hill, on a sudden both the horses set out without any visible cause, and flew down the hill like an arrow. In a minute John fell off the coach-box. The horses then went on at full speed, sometimes to the edge of the ditch on the right, sometimes on the left. A cart came up against them. They avoided it as exactly as if the man had been on the box. A narrow bridge was at the foot of the hill. They went directly over the middle of it. They ran up the next hill with the same speed, many persons meeting us, but getting out of the way. Near the top of the hill was a gate, which led into a farmyard. It stood open. They turned short, and ran through it, without touching the gate on one side of the post or the other, and galloped on through the cornfield. The little girls cried out, 'Grandpapa, save us!' I told them, 'Nothing will hurt you; do not be afraid.' The horses ran on till they came to the edge of a steep precipice. Just then Mr. Smith, who could not overtake us before, galloped in between. They stopped in a moment. Had they gone on ever so little, he and we must have gone down together."

LOOKING FOR THE COMING OF THE LORD.

In His Own Person—To Take His People—The Bodies Redeemed—Not a General Resurrection—The Living Changed—Visible Appearance—Manifestation in Judgment—Of Importance to the Lord—Coming in His Kingdom—The Gospel a Permeatory not a Displacing Power—The Future Kingdom to Displace all Others—The Time of the Coming.

WHEN our Lord Jesus was about to leave His disciples, He said, "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto Myself" (John 14 : 3). This utterance is often referred to as if it were fulfilled whenever a believer is taken out of this world by death. But, when our Lord spoke of coming again to take us to Himself, He meant He would come in His own person, and not merely that He would send a servant to fetch us to be with Him in heaven. This is evident if we look at Acts 1 : 11. When the astonished disciples were looking after Jesus, who had been taken up from them into the cloud, two men in white apparel stood by them and said, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." If death were the coming of the Lord, it could not be said that He shall so come in like manner as He went, for He went in His own person. The coming of our Lord Jesus, then, is a personal coming.

The Lord's coming is a coming

TO TAKE HIS PEOPLE to Himself.

When He comes the bodies of His people shall be redeemed. We, even now, are the redeemed of the Lord, but we look for the day of complete redemption. We know (1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17) that "the Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout. . . and the dead in Christ shall rise first." This is not a general resurrection, but a resurrection merely of saints—of the dead in Christ. Further, "we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air." In 1 Cor. 15 : 51, we find that those who are alive on the earth at the Lord's coming, and are thus caught up, are changed in body. "Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." In keeping with this we read in Phil. 3 : 20, "Our citizenship is in heaven, from whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of His glory."

Thus, at the coming of Christ, the saints who have fallen asleep shall receive the resurrection body, and the saints who are alive on the earth at the time and are caught up shall be changed in body. Then shall take place the adoption for which we have waited, to wit, the redemption of our body (Rom. 8 : 23). 'This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." We have a suggestion of what the body of Jesus' glory (to which ours shall be conformed) shall be like in what the three disciples saw on the Mount of Transfiguration. "We shall bear the image of the heavenly," and "then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."

When Jesus comes His people shall behold Him face to face. To see Jesus, the Lover of our souls, Him who is nearer than the nearest, and dearer than the dearest, is in itself precious. As children we often sang—

'I think, when I read that sweet story of old,
How, when Jesus was here among men,
He called little children as lambs to His fold;
I should like to have been with them then."

And we shall behold and look upon Him.

"Soon shall these eyes behold Him,
With rapture, face to face;
The half hath not been told us
Of all His love and grace."

But this sight of Jesus, precious in itself, is unspeakably precious on account of what is involved in it. We read in 1 John 3 : 2, "When He shall appear we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." In the beholding of Jesus there will be likeness to Him.

When Jesus comes His people shall be made manifest before His judgment-seat. "Made manifest" is the true rendering, rather than "appear," in 11 Cor. 5 : 10. This is not the judgment of the great white throne recorded in Rev. 20 : 12. That takes place at the second resurrection. This is the Lord

RECKONING WITH HIS SERVANTS.

In view of this reckoning we read in 1 Cor. 4 : 5, "Judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall every man have praise of God." When Jesus comes He will make manifest not only the works of our hands, but the very counsels of the heart. How cheering and encouraging for those who, by reason of physical weakness and infirmity, have been able to do but little! You know how God said to David when he was forbidden to build the temple, "It was well that it was in thine heart to do it." God regarded the desire of his heart. Many may, like Him, have been hindered providentially from active work, and yet may have praise.

When the Lord reckons with His own He will put things in the true light, and the faithfulness of the servant of God, however hidden previously, will be acknowledged. Faithfulness in the bearing of trial will be duly owned. "Now, for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations; that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 1 : 6). The praise and honor and glory are connected with the being made manifest before His tribunal.

At the same time the one who has been privileged to do actual work shall have his faithfulness graciously brought to light and rewarded. "When the Chief Shepherd shall appear" the elders who have fed the flock and taken the oversight, not as lords, but rather as ensamples, "shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." The winner of souls shall see the fruit of His labor, even as Paul says when writing to the Thessalonians who have been brought to Jesus through his instrumentality, "What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming? For ye are our glory and joy."

The coming of our Lord Jesus for His saints is the necessary step toward the manifestation of the sons of God. "When Christ, who is our life, shall be manifested, then shall ye also be manifested with Him in glory" (Col. 3 : 4) "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Then "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." If we suffer with Him we shall also reign with Him.

The coming of our Lord Jesus is set before us as an event of importance

IN RELATION TO OUR LORD

Himself as well as in relation to His people.

It is connected with His having the bride. "Christ loved the Church, and gave Himself for it, that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word, that He might present it to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish. So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh; this is a great mystery, but I speak concerning Christ and the Church." Jesus, as it were, looks forward to His coming as to the time when He shall have the church presented to Him in spotlessness—the church whom He has redeemed to Himself, and who shall be united to Him in closest and everlasting bonds.

The coming of our Lord is a coming in His kingdom. He has, presently, gone to receive for Himself a kingdom; and, having received it, to return. Then shall come to pass what is written in the prophet Daniel, "The God of heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed." This kingdom shall displace the kingdoms of the earth—they shall become "like the chaff of the summer threshing floor" (Dan. 2 : 35). Men speak as if this were the spiritual kingdom which arises in the present dispensation through the preaching of the Gospel. But the Gospel the kingdoms of the earth; it permeates them. The kingdom yet to be set up is one before which no place shall be found for others. "It shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms." The Lord Jesus is looking for His coming, expecting till His enemies be put under His feet and the kingdom set up which "shall stand for ever."

When our Lord comes in His kingdom, He will come to be manifested in glory. Once He came in lowly form, "He came to His own and His own received Him not." The world that was made by Him knew Him not. He is coming again in the glory of His Father, with all His holy angels. "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him."

"He shall come to be glorified in His saints and to be admired in all them that believe" (11 Thess. 1 : 10). In that day not only will Jesus be manifest in His own glory and the glory of His Father, but every saint also shall be a mirror of His glory; and He glorified in them.

The coming of the Lord seems to be set before the church as one that may take place at any time, at any moment; yet "of that day and hour knoweth no man; no, not the angels in heaven, but My Father only." The word spoken of the Thessalonians (1 Thess. 1 : 9, 10) sets forth that there is nothing necessary between us and the coming of the Lord: "ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God; and to wait for His Son from heaven." Their business was to serve God and to look for Jesus. Similarly in 1 Cor. 1 : 7 we find the apostle exhorting the believers to "come behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." Their attitude was clearly that of looking as for an event which might take place any day and any hour.

Now, let it be remarked here that there are events which must take place before our Lord comes to set up His kingdom on the earth; but these, so far as we know, may take place after the Lord has descended to the air for His saints and taken them to Himself.

The first stage in the Lord's coming is simply a descent to the upper air. "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." He is not coming to the earth, then, but to the air. Afterward, as Jude tells us, "The Lord cometh with ten thousands of His saints to execute judgment." When He comes to the air He will gather His saints to Himself, and then, in His further progress toward judgment on earth and setting up His kingdom, His saints are with Him.

"The day of the Lord," referred to in 11 Thess., seems to refer to the time when judgment shall begin to be executed, and so to a time subsequent to the coming of the Lord for the air for His saints. There might be time, then, for the great apostasy to manifest itself between the time of the gathering of the saints to meet the Lord and the inauguration of the day of the Lord. May not the believer, then, look for the Lord's coming at any time? Whenever it is, "we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye."

"NO ADMITTANCE EXCEPT ON BUSINESS."

By Rev. Charles Courtenay.

OUR readers must not think that Peter Callow, for that was his name, wound off his speech as readily as they can read it. He had to stop now and then to remember his next point. Neither did he stop his work to deliver himself. It was spoken as a sort of accompaniment to the tapping of the hammer. Neither did Robert Cadman, his fellow-workman, remain silent the whole time, for more than one grunt of disapproval escaped his lips.

"Good-by," I said, "and thank you. It won't be your fault if this beer-drinking goes on."

"No, it won't," said his mate somewhat grimly.

The day was Saturday, and the time twelve o'clock in the morning, when I next found myself on the same spot. I had come to see with my own eyes whether report said true or not.

There was the pay-box, and there was the pay-master, with his spectacles on his nose, distributing the money. And there too were the happy recipients of the same, massed together around the door like bees, waiting their turn with evident impatience.

Yes, and there too was the hero of the beer cans, without his apron now and without his cans too, as large as life, and as busy as he could be.

It was quick work certainly, for he had to name the debt, and give the change in almost the twinkling of an eye. I don't think that I ever saw a man working harder than that beer-seller that morning. But what a pitiable sight it was, so much hard-earned money paid away for useless beer. It was thrown away, I couldn't help thinking.

Ah! here are our two friends coming out. They too have received their wages.

First comes our teetotal friend, who stalks by the beer man with a step as independent as a king, jingling his money with an air of triumph, as much as to say, "You'll get nothing out of me, my fine fellow."

Next comes his mate, who is waylaid in a moment and forced to part with more than a shilling or two. Two or three "refreshers" a day mount up to a goodly sum in a week, as he finds to his cost.

But now comes a fresh face on the scene, a woman's, and she steers straight to Robert with an appealing face, saying—

"I hope you're going to bring home a tidy bit, Bob."

And when Bob shakes his head and tells her how much, she bursts into tears. Then she grows angry and says some sharp things.

"Yon chap's got the money, my money, my children's money," she said, addressing me.

Then she turned angrily on the tapman—

"You're the workingman's curse, you are, a-prowling around 'em with your beer cans, a-tempting 'em. You knows they're poor weak mortals as can't say no."

"Bess, lass, come away. You can't mend matters now, you know," said her husband's mate.

And she went to her miserable home. But I still stood and watched on. I couldn't help contrasting the men who were in debt with those who owed nothing. I thought I could see a difference in their very faces. There was a respectability, a vigor, and a healthy look about the one which seemed entirely wanting in the other. And the difference in intelligence seemed quite as strongly marked.

I think I never saw the advantages of abstinence over intemperance so clearly and unmistakably as on that morning.

Some curious scenes I witnessed.

One man tried to slink away in the crowd, and so to escape the payment of his debt. Probably the thought of his needy family was the motive for the action. But it was of no good. Before he had moved away many steps his name was sharply called and he was promptly reminded that, no pay now, no beer next week. It was quite enough. A whole week without beer would be intolerable, and he paid up every penny.

Another tried to compromise matters. He would pay a part. He had a sick child at home and he wanted to buy some little delicacy for her. He would pay up all next week. But the tapman was firm.

"You should have thought of that in the week. I'll take nothing less. You've had your beer, and you must pay for it or take the consequences."

Another, as he paid down his money, said, "It's the last you'll ever get out of me, my man. You've had too much of my money already. I signed the pledge last night." And when the tapman muttered out "More fool you," he cast a merry look upon him and said with a wink, "You know better than that, now."

One man clinked his money in the tapman's face and said, "'Tis the first time I've ever got hold of a full week's wages, and it sha'n't be the last. My wife'll be glad, I know. No thanks to you, though. I've been a fool to let you ever have any of it."

But these were exceptions. The greater number paid their debts readily, accounting it to be a debt of honor which it would be mean indeed to evade. They considered this debt more binding than any other that existed, more binding than all the butchers', landlords', grocers', and bakers' bills put together.

It was a sad sight altogether. It opened my eyes to a state of things quite new to me. It showed me that strong drink plays a greater part in the world's miseries than I had ever realized before. One tapman can wreck many a home.

After the scene I had witnessed on the Saturday morning I felt most sad and distressed. I could do nothing with any pleasure. And when I went to bed at night I could not even sleep. All the night through the various events of the day kept swimming in my brain and lying like a dead weight upon my heart. It was the same all through the Sunday.

It was in church that the thought flashed into my mind, "Why not tell the employer? Perhaps he knows nothing of it, and might stop it."

Early on Monday morning I started, my mind easier than it had been since Saturday, for I felt I was on the right track at last.

A gentlemanly man was the employer, with as kindly a face as you would see anywhere; not a man to wink at wrong-doing, I was sure. I told my story as simply as I could. I pictured the waste of money and strength that was going on through the drink that was vended in his own workshops. I described the heart-rending appeal of the poor wife. And then I frankly put it to him, "Won't you, in mercy, put your foot down and stop it?"

"It shall be done; I assure you it shall."

And then he told me how surprised he was that his former order had not been complied with, and bitterly blamed himself for not having looked more narrowly into the matter.

"Come with me," he then said. "We'll settle the question without any more delay."

On the way he opened out his heart to me—how not very long ago he was living without God in the world, bent only on making money and spending it; and how there came a message to him from one whose lips were then paling in death, his own dear wife—"Prepare to meet thy God." He could not shake it off although he tried hard. The arrow of conviction rankled in his heart in spite of his efforts. At last he decided he would be a Christian. He would give himself to the Lord Jesus Christ. He would spend the rest of his life for the Saviour who had redeemed him, and he had begun to do so. "But oh!" he said, "I wish I had chosen the Lord Jesus before. So much of my short life have I wasted and lost."

And now we had come to the works. There is admittance, for us, for we are come on business—a blessed business.

The employer showed me some of the manufactures of the place to pass away the time before the arrival of the tapman..

Ah! here he comes—apron, cans, and all. What an important man he thinks himself to be! How shamelessly he clashes his cans, as though he had as much right there as the owner himself! And now the employer sees with his own eyes the power and popularity of the drink. He sees the tools thrown down, and crowds of workmen hustling one another in their thirsty haste. I should explain that neither of us had appeared in full view yet. It would not have been good policy.

Now, however, the employer shows himself, and, leaving me behind, walks up to the drinking crowd.

He is recognized by the workmen in a moment, and they fall respectfully back. He is not recognized, however, by the tapman, for he, in his playful glee—he had nearly emptied his cans—asked him whether he wasn't a trifle thirsty and wouldn't have a can all to himself.

"Shut up, you fool!" said the foreman, "don't you see it's the boss?"

And now the employer signifies his intention to say a word to his men. And so they are all brought together, for some had slunk away ashamed of themselves.

It was a curious scene, that crowd of grimy men, with the employer and the tapman in the midst of them. It would have made a capital picture.

"My men, I have a word to say to you, a word of regret, let me say, for I'm not ashamed to confess that I've been in the wrong in not looking after you as I ought to have done. You know my feelings on religion, for I haven't hid them in a corner. And now I've got a word to say to you on the subject of the drink, for I have my opinions on that too. From this day I become a teetotaler—from this day I strongly prohibit any strong drink being introduced into my works. And I wish my foreman clearly to understand that violation of the rule means instant dismissal to the man who breaks it. My men, I entreat you to break with the drink. For your families' sakes, for your own sakes, for your souls' sakes, have done with it from to-day. I should be thankful indeed if every man in my works would become a total abstainer from all strong drink."

Then turning to the tapman he said:

"And as for you, if you dare to bring your beer cans into these works again, I will have you brought before the magistrates for trespassing. And so begone!"

As we were leaving the works I found myself tapped on the shoulder by my old teetotal orator, who softly whispered:

"Thank God, sir. 'Tis a good day's work you've been and done to-day."

The Conversion of a Persistent Scoffer was announced at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting a few days ago. He is the son of a Christian minister, and one Saturday recently prayer was requested for him and was offered. He had long withstood, and even resented, all efforts to induce him to converse upon matters concerning his soul's welfare. Indeed, he sneered at those who manifested their interest by speaking to him. With much regret those thus anxious for him resolved to leave him alone and make him a subject of more earnest prayer than ever. Prayer was presented on his behalf at the Fulton Street meeting and other places. Two days afterward the young man was earnestly inquiring the way of salvation, and shortly afterward found peace in believing. It is his earnest desire to become a minister of the Gospel.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Public Debt has been Decreased During the past four months by nearly $40,000,000 dollars. The excess of receipts over disbursements for the same period was $34,500,000, which is about $12,000,000 less than the surplus for the corresponding months of the last year, when the tariff and internal taxes had not been disturbed. The falling off in Customs and internal revenue indicates a decrease of about $60,000,000 in the year's receipts, while the actual surplus for the four months indicates a surplus of about $100,000,000 for the whole year. The calls for bonds already out and likely to be issued before Congress meets render the action of the banks a cause of anxiety. At present there seems to be no alternative between withdrawing their circulation, or purchasing bonds at a premium so high as to render the business unremunerative.

On Tuesday Last Elections were Held in Ten States. The results are not known at the time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press. Except in four States, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Maryland, and Minnesota the elections were this year of comparatively minor importance. Those States, however, elected their Governors and in the case of Massachusetts the fight was an exciting one on account of the influence it will probably have on the Presidential election next year. In the other six States local officers and parts of the State Legislatures were chosen.

The Failure of the Greely Relief Expedition is to be investigated by a Court of Inquiry. The order for the court was issued by the President on Oct. 31st. The officers appointed are directed to make a thorough investigation of all matters relating to the general conduct of the expedition, including particularly the failure of the Proteus to keep in company with the Yantic up to Littleton Island or its neighborhood, and the failure to establish a well-provided relief station at or near Littleton Island; and to take into consideration in their investigation such records and correspondence pertaining to the original Greely expedition as they may deem necessary, and to report the facts developed by their investigation and their opinion as to whether the conduct of any officer of the Army in the premises calls for further proceedings before a general court-martial, and the reasons for the conclusions which they may reach. The court is directed to assemble to-day in Washington. A letter from Secretary Lincoln to the Chief Signal Officer plainly expresses his dissatisfaction with the conduct of the expedition, especially as to its failure to leave stores at Littleton Island, which he characterizes as possibly a fatal mistake.

The Effect of the Reduction in the Rate of postage has not been so injurious to the revenue as was predicted. In order to arrange the estimates for next year inquiries were recently sent out by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General to the postmasters at thirty of the largest post offices in the country, directing them to report promptly the amount received on account of sales of stamps in the month of October, in which the reduced rate of postage on letters was in operation. Returns have so far been received from twenty cities. It is understood that they are extremely satisfactory, indicating beyond a doubt the wisdom of the reduction. Only one office shows reduced receipts as compared with October, 1882, and in that case the difference is small. Taking all the offices reporting, an average increase of a little more than six per cent is found as compared with the same month of last year. It is an encouraging fact that nearly all the postmasters reported a marked increase in the number of letters passing through the mails since the reduction took effect.

A Disastrous Fire Occurred at Savannah, Ga., on October 31st. It broke out about noon in a large cotton warehouse. Before it was brought under control it had completely destroyed the warehouse, containing 3000 bales of cotton, 1300 houses, covering an area half a mile square, causing a loss of nine lives, of which eight were of colored people. It is believed that the loss of property is fully $1,000,000. The origin of the fire is not known. While several hands were rolling bales from the warehouse, flames suddenly burst from one of them, and, fanned by a strong draught, communicated with great rapidity to all the others. Almost before the terrified negroes could effect their escape the whole interior of the building was converted into a roaring furnace, which quickly reduced the structure and its contents to ruins. The strong wind which was blowing carried the flames to several adjoining buildings, and before the Fire Department got well to work it was evident that the western part of the city was doomed. It was inhabited almost exclusively by negroes, and the buildings were in the main one- and two-story wooden structures, interspersed here and there with small groceries, groggeries, and small brick dwellings.

The Prospects of Prohibition in Iowa are encouraging. The Iowa correspondent of a New York journal says: "Both the Legislature and the Senate have a clear Prohibition majority, and statutory Prohibition will be enacted this winter, which will serve for two years, by which time the Constitutional Amendment will be ratified by the Supreme Court. Meanwhile, the amending of the personnel of the Supreme Court itself, begun with this election, will be completed a year from now; so that its decision then will ratify the popular vote, which gave thirty thousand majority last year in favor of Constitutional Prohibition. So henceforth the reign of the saloon in Iowa is at an end. But much close watching has yet to be done." Other reports state that the Prohibition strength in the Legislature is doubtful, and that on the most favorable calculation a majority of four in that House is all that can be expected.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy, founded by the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., announces a most attractive course of lectures for the winter. This institute is doing a magnificent work in this country by waging war on infidelity and proving to young men that Christianity is not antagonistic to science and philosophy. By its publications, its lectures, and its various means of promoting intellectual culture, it is disproving the charge, so often brought, and so readily believed, that the believing Christian ignores scientific facts, and that he cannot be a Christian and a philosopher at the same time. In the present condition of society there is no work so urgently needed as this, and the Institute of Christian Philosophy is doing it well. It deserves the support of all Christian teachers and all patriots concerned in preventing the spread among the masses of the atheistic, agnostic, and socialist doctrines which many of our German immigrants are zealously propagating. The lectures for the season will be delivered in Broadway Tabernacle on Thirty-fourth Street and Sixth Avenue, New York, on Tuesday evenings, November 20th and 27th, and December 4th, 11th and 18th. The lecturers are Benjamin N. Martin, D.D., Professor in the University of New York; Rev. A. H. Bradford, A.M., of Montclair, N. J.; Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D.; Jesse B. Thomas, D.D., of Brooklyn, N. Y., and Edwin Harwood, D.D., of New Haven, Conn. Tickets costing one dollar admit the bearer to all the five lectures.

Mrs. M. F. Shipman, the Gospel Temperance advocate from England, whose portrait with a sketch of her life appears on another page, will conduct Gospel temperance meetings next week at Greenpoint, L. I. She has engaged to proceed thence to Lowell, Mass., to hold services from November 11th to December 2d. She has accepted an invitation to conduct services at Fall River, Mass., from December 3d to December 16th, after which special revival services will be held under her superintendence in Methodist churches in New York and Brooklyn. Arrangements are being made for her to hold services afterward in several cities in Pennsylvania. As Mrs. Shipman has arranged to return to England in June, pastors of churches and managers of missions who may desire to avail themselves of her services should send an early application. Any letters addressed to her, if sent to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y., will be forwarded to her.

The Topics for the Week of Prayer for Young Men's Christian Associations commencing with Sunday next are: Sunday morning, "The Holy Spirit: Have You Received Power from Him?" afternoon, "What Seemed Impossible, Commanded, and Accomplished;" evening, "Questions Worthy of Thoughtful Consideration." For the week-days "Opportunities" is the general topic, divided into opportunities used, unused, improved, abused, and lost, and one more opportunity.

The Rev. John S. Inskip, the Eminent Methodist minister, who is well known and respected throughout the country and on the other side of the Atlantic, was stricken with paralysis on October 24th. The attack is said to have been a severe one. At the last reports he was speechless, and his physicians fear that even if he should survive he will never be able to speak in public again. Mr. Inskip when prostrated by illness was about to commence a series of special services in Boston, Mass.

A Week's Gospel Temperance Meetings, Conducted by Mr. Francis Murphy, have been held at Haverstraw, N. Y. Large numbers of the citizens signed the pledge at each of the meetings and put on the blue ribbon. That Mr. Murphy's labors were not unneeded in that locality is proved by the fact that only a short time ago there were more than one hundred unlicensed saloons in the place, and they were all doing a flourishing business. Dr. R. Harcourt, the pastor of the church at which Mr. Murphy held his meetings, has been contending for more than six months with the liquor dealers. He succeeded in organizing a Law and Order League, which compelled the unlicensed saloons to take out licenses or close their doors.

The Success of the Special Services in Kansas City, Mo., conducted by Mr. Thomas Harrison, has been remarkable. Nearly three hundred persons have united with the Methodist Church on probation, while many others connected themselves with other churches in the city. Twenty-six entire families were converted and are now probationers in the Church.

A Search for a Fugitive Heir in California has ended unsuccessfully. A Mr. Gustave Langenberg, of Dusseldorf, Germany, arrived here some six months ago on a search for his brother Karl, who is one of the principal legatees of an aunt who died three years ago leaving an estate valued at $200,000. There is a tinge of romance in the story of Karl's life. In 1876 he was serving in a Hussar regiment stationed at Dusseldorf, and commanded by Prince Salm-Salm. He was a quarrelsome man, and one day he got into a fight with three Uhlans, wounded two of them, and had his own head opened by a sabre stroke. After lying in the hospital several weeks he was court-martialed and condemned to fifteen months' imprisonment in the Citadel at Wesel. With the aid of a sentinel he escaped and reached Brussels. From Brussels he came to Philadelphia. When last heard from Karl was in Santa Monica, Lower California. The search failed to discover the whereabouts of the missing heir, and his brother sailed for home without finding him. We may be sure Karl did not know that his brother was searching for him to tell him of an inheritance, or he would have revealed himself. Men do not neglect such good fortune, though, when they are told of an eternal inheritance in the skies, they do not make any attempt to secure it (1 Peter 1 : 4).

A Curious Case of Suspended Mental Growth is reported as existing in the county almshouse at Erie, Pa. It is that of a girl of sixteen years of age, whose mental condition is in all respects that of an infant. The mother of the girl was exceedingly sensitive on the subject of her daughter's state, and to spare her feelings the facts were kept secret until her death, which occurred a few weeks ago. The girl was born in Venango Township, her parents being poor, deserving people. When two months old the child had an attack of brain fever. It recovered its physical health, but all mental progress was arrested. She grew and developed into a fine, handsome girl, but had to be treated as a baby. She has never tasted solid food, but has been fed like an infant. She has a perfect set of teeth, beautiful clear-cut features, and luxuriant growth of hair. Dr. Lovett, the surgeon in charge, says she may live to be an old woman of eighty. All the organs are healthy, and the skin is so nearly transparent that the superficial veins can be traced through the skin. Several reporters visited her last week, one of whom jingled a bunch of keys before the young woman's eyes, and she evinced the delight of an infant. The physicians are deeply interested in this case of arrested mental development on account of its rarity. Unhappily, pastors and Christian workers are familiar with the phenomenon in spiritual affairs, but there, unlike the case of the unfortunate girl, the lamentable condition is not the product of disease (Heb. 5 : 12).

Two Neglected Graves in the Allegheny Cemetery are accounted for in a romantic way by a Pittsburg journal. It states that the graves are near together, and that about eighteen months ago the body of a man was interred in one of them, and six months later the corpse of a lady was laid in the other. For some time the moss on each grave was carefully weeded, and the plants set there received constant attention. Now they are overrun with weeds, and their neglected appearance shows that they receive no care. Inquiries resulted in the discovery that the widower while attending to his wife's grave had been attracted by the appearance of the widow who was cultivating the adjacent lot in which her dead husband was laid, and that the acquaintance made there had ripened and developed until they decided to unite their fortunes. They were quietly married, and since that time the two graves in the cemetery have not been visited. This amusing result of associated grief does not appear inconsistent to those who have studied human nature closely. Nothing alleviates grief for the dead so quickly as love for the living. But when we see those who have pledged their fealty to Christ drawn away from Him by ungodly husbands or wives, then we are sure that they never fully realized that He is ever living and loving them (John 14 : 19-21).

A Pathetic Reason for a Vote was given recently by a voter in Ohio, who supported the Second Amendment. He said : "My main reason for voting for prohibition was purely a personal one. As my fellow-citizens know, I am the victim of an uncontrollable appetite for strong drink. I have repeatedly attempted to break the fetters that bind me, but have as often failed. The temptations thrown in my way by the numerous saloons that abound are too much for me, and I now find myself growing old, broken down in health, self-confidence, self-respect, and poor, from the effects of the accursed habit that has enslaved me. The bright promise of my youth is blighted, and I am conscious that my family and friends regard me more with pity than any other sentiment. I have no hope for the future, save in the removal from my path of the temptations that now beset me at every street corner. As a drowning man catches at a straw, I seized hold of the Second Amendment, in the hope that if it carried it might deliver me from bondage." The poor man had scriptural reason for hoping that he would have the sympathy of all Christian men (Hab. 2 : 15).

The Ruin Effected by a Hotel on its Owner's family was pathetically described last week by an aged lady, who called at the coroner's office in New Haven, Conn., to identify the body of a girl who had poisoned herself. She said : "I knew well a dozen years ago the family to which this girl belongs. It was one of the best families I ever met with, and they were kind to me and my folks in a time of severe affliction to us. After that they moved to Norwalk, where they went into that hotel. That was the turning point in the lives of the family. It was the ruination of the whole of them. Rum and dissolute company did it.. The mother went down ; one of the daughters—Emma, a lovely girl—killed herself in New York by taking laudanum as a result of it, and now this one has gone. They were beautiful girls and were well brought up until they entered that miserable hotel. My daughters have played with them for hours. Oh, my heart bleeds for this poor dead one now!" Yet the hotel, to which the old lady alluded, is said to have been a splendid financial success. The wealth gained there must seem to the owner to have been purchased at a fearful cost. Each of the sinners must answer to God for her own sins, but what must be the responsibility of the husband and father (Jer. 31 : 29. 30).

A Man Killed by Suspense was Sought for recently by a former friend and companion, whose inquiries led to the publication of circumstances which occurred many years ago. It appears that in the course of a drinking brawl at Lackawaxen, Pa., a man was killed. The murderer was seized, tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The conviction occurred just as the governor's term was expiring, and he went out of office without signing the warrant for the murderer's execution. It was supposed that the new governor would sign it. But day after day passed, and nothing was done. The condemned man lay in jail three years, the prey of suspense and anxiety, which destroyed his appetite and prevented him sleeping. Finally he was released under proceedings on a writ of error, but he was a mere skeleton, broken in health and spirits when he left the prison, which he had entered a stalwart, robust man. After wandering about aimlessly for a few weeks, he died in an obscure boarding-house. The recovery of his liberty could not undo the injury wrought on his constitution by the weary months of agonizing suspense. It is marvellous that impenitent sinners do not suffer even worse torture. They are already sentenced to death eternal, into which they may be hurried at any moment, yet they are often unconcerned, making no effort to secure the offered salvation (John 3 : 18).

What Makes Faith Easy—The Holy Spirit—Despair the Mother of Faith—A Consumptive Cured.

I BELIEVE that our own Authorized Version conveys to the mind of the reader the sense intended by the Evangelist ; it is, however, exceedingly probable that in exact words the Revised Version is nearer to the original. It runs thus—"And Jesus said unto him, If thou canst! All things are possible to him that believeth." Our own Version better expresses the sense to the general reader, and the main object of a translation is to give the meaning. The father of the lunatic child had said to our Lord, "If Thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us ;" and our divine Master virtually replies, "The 'if thou canst' lies not with Me, but with thee. It is not if I can, but if thou canst." Thus you see the word "believe" is implied if not actually expressed. Jesus would certainly go as far as ever the man's faith could go ; but as is, "According to thy faith, so be it unto thee," the man's unbelief would hamper the Lord in His working. If the suppliant could be rid of unbelief, Jesus would get rid of the devil from his child. The difficulty of casting out the demon lay mainly in the want of faith in the father.

Let it, then, be understood as the teaching of this text, that the difficulties in the way of souls that would be saved do not lie with Jesus Christ, but with themselves. They need never ask the question, "Can Jesus forgive?" or "Can He renew?" there is a prior question—Canst thou believe that He can forgive, and that He can renew? If God's grace enables thee to say, "I can and do believe that Jesus can work in me according to the full measure of my need," then all difficulty has vanished.

I. The first subject we shall speak about is the vital question—

WHAT IS BELIEVING?

After all these hundreds of years of Gospel preaching, is this question necessary? I believe it is so necessary that, if faith were explained in every sermon, it would not be too often spoken of, for still, despite all the Gospel teaching which is around us, nothing is so little known or so little understood as faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Let us take the man before us as an example, and from him let us see what faith is. This man evidently believed that Jesus was a healer, for he says, "I brought my son unto Thee." He would not have brought his son to Jesus if he had not felt some measure of confidence in Him. It is a good beginning of faith to know that if I am saved it must be through Jesus Christ alone ; it is well to be aware that the salvation of the soul must come from the work of Jesus, and from no one else, since no other name is given among men whereby we must be saved.

This man had also some slight faith in Christ's willingness to help him. It may not have been very strong, but still it was there, or else he would not have laid the stress of his prayer upon the Lord's power ; he did not say "if Thou wilt Thou canst," but "if Thou canst do anything, have compassion on us, and help us." Looking up into that blessed face so full of singular tenderness, the man felt that he might say, "Have compassion on us." From some persons we could not ask compassion or fellow-feeling, because they do not appear to have any; they wear a harsh look, and a chill air surrounds them; but the Saviour was not so; the man felt that Jesus was full of compassion; his suit was that this compassion would show itself to him and his son.

What is it really and savingly to believe in Jesus? The suppliant father had not yet reached that point of faith which would secure the miracle; more was needed; what was it? He needed to believe in Christ's power in reference to his own case. The point in which his faith failed was our Lord's power as to the special case now before Him, for he said—"If Thou canst do anything." Before you condemn for his doubt, let me remind you that his son was in a very evil plight, and our Lord had just caused him to remember and review the sad features of the case. The father had sorrowfully dilated upon the fact that "wheresoever the spirit taketh him, he teareth him; and he foameth, and gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away;" and then he had further told the Lord that the youth had suffered thus ever since he was a child; and he had gone still more into detail, saying, "Ofttimes it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him." After that painful detail he added his pitiful "If Thou canst." Do you wonder at it?

Jesus seems to tell him, "If thou canst believe in the teeth of all this, then thou shalt see the salvation of God." It is very easy to say, "I believe" when you have no sense of your sin, and no consciousness of your danger. It is the easiest thing in the world to say, "Yes, Christ can save me," when you do not really believe that you need saving. Faith, where there is no present sense of need, is but the image of faith, and not the grace which saves the soul. This is the question: Can you, my dear hearer, at this moment trust Jesus to save you, though you feel that you are full of sin? Can you say, "Lord, I am possessed with the spirit of evil; I am under bondage to him, and have been so since I was a child? I have been driven to one sin and so cast into the fire, and then I have been hurled into the opposite sin, and so thrown into the water: I have been rent with passion, and torn with evil desires; I have sinned against light and knowledge, I have sinned against love and mercy; I have sinned in thought, and word, and deed; I have sinned grievously and continually, and yet I believe that Thou canst pardon me, and that Thou canst make me a new creature. Wicked as I am, I believe that Thou canst drive sin from the throne of my heart and cause me to love Thee and to serve Thee all my days." If thou canst believe in Jesus after this fashion He will save thee, yea He has saved thee.

If thou, as an undeserving sinner, canst so honor the mercy of God as to believe that through Christ Jesus He can blot out thy sin, it shall be done unto thee; only remember that this confidence must not come unto thee because of thy forgetfulness of thy sin, but while thou art conscious of it and humbled on its account. If I persuade myself that I am merely a sinner in name, then I shall only find Jesus to be a Saviour in name. The downright sinner, who dares not deny his guilt, is the object of the Lord's saving search. In the teeth of thy conscious gilt, canst thou believe that Jesus can wash thee and renew thee? Then thou hast one main element of the faith which saves.

Will you please to notice about this man's faith that it was

NOT PERFECT FAITH.

Though it obtained for him the healing of his son, it was weak faith, and for its weakness he was blamable; but the faultiness of his faith was not the destruction of his faith. The anxious father had to cry, "Lord, help my unbelief," but that unbelief, confessed and lamented, did not shut him out of the blessing. The unbelief which lingers around our faith is a thing to be got rid of by the help of Christ, but still it will not destroy the virtue of the faith which we possess. So, dear friend, if thy faith in Jesus Christ amounts to this, that thou believest Him able to serve, and thou dost therefore trust Him, thou art a saved man, even though thou mayest be staggered with a host of fears, and troubled with a multitude of sins. Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace; for that faith of thine shall grow from a mustard-seed into a far-spreading tree.

This faith in the Lord Jesus ought to be to each one of us the easiest thing in all the world. If we were what we ought to be it would never occur to us to doubt our Lord Jesus; and our shameful unbelief of Him is the most conclusive evidence of our need of Him, for we must have become grievously wrong in heart to be forced to admit that we find it difficult to believe in Jesus. What an insult to Him! What a crime on our part! Remember the whole story of grace and blush for your wicked unbelief.

There ought to be no room for an "if" when we know that in the Lord Jesus all fulness dwells. I am not at this moment speaking to those who reject the word of God, and deny the Deity of Christ: I can understand their position, and deal with them another time; but I am now speaking to you who accept this Bible as God's Word, and unquestioningly believe that Jesus Christ is Divine; to you I say that your refusal to put your trust in Him is without excuse; at least, I cannot find an excuse for you.

WHY IS FAITH DIFFICULT?

II. I have tried thus to explain the nature of faith. I will now, in the second place, deal with the startling question, How is it that faith can be difficult? It certainly is difficult to some. It cannot be so in itself, yet many in trouble of heart find it to be so, and those that labor to bring them to Christ, find themselves sore put to it.

Why, first, it is difficult to get the very idea of faith into some men's minds—not only difficult for them to believe, but even to know what it is to believe. I have met with persons who have attended a place of worship regularly twenty or thirty years, and yet they have never made the discovery that faith is a childlike trust in Jesus. We try by illustrations, by anecdotes, by parables, to drill the notion of faith into men; but we cannot even get it into their heads, much less into their hearts. Martin Luther complained that he thought he must take the Bible and bang it about his hearers' heads because he could not get them to see its clear teaching as to justification by faith. This idea of believing is alien to men's minds, and it can only dwell there by forcing its way against the tendency of human nature. Again, I say, that this is a sad proof of human depravity, since in itself it is no difficult idea; it is the simplest thought that can be uttered or accepted. Trust thou thy salvation with Christ, and Christ will save thee, is a lesson which a babe may learn.

When we get that thought into our hearers' heads, then there comes the next difficulty, to make them believe that faith can save them. It seems so difficult to believe this because the way is so easy. They say—What! am I, after thirty, forty, fifty years of sin, to be delivered from all the punishment of my transgressions by simply trusting to the Lord Jesus Christ? If they were to look at the idea of propitiating God by their personal suffering, it would soon become impossible of belief; yet for a time they incline to it rather than to the doctrine of salvation by trust in the great Substitute. Hideous imaginings, despairings, and dreads are also looked upon hopefully by many; they hope that by deep feelings they may arrive at forgiveness, and may force their way to heaven by the gates of hell; but to trust Christ, and to believe the promise of God, is a thing too simple for them; they fear that safety is not to be found so soon! Ah! poor soul, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldst thou not have done it? How much rather then when He saith to thee, "Believe and live?"

When they get over the idea of its extreme ease, they say to themselves, "This news is certainly

TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE.

Do I really understand you, sir, that if I trust the Lord Jesus now I am at once delivered from sin and am made a new creature in Christ?" Yes, you understand my teaching if that is the sense you find in my words. Yet you say it is too good to be true. Do you not see how poorly you think of your God? I know that pardoning grace is infinitely above your deservings or thoughts; but then does not the Lord say of Himself, "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts?" Grace may be too good for you to expect, but it is not too good for God to bestow.

HE FORGIVES LIKE A GOD, and this does not stagger our faith, but confirms it.

Then, again, men are astounded by the rapidity of justification. Shall fifty years' sinning be forgiven in a moment? Shall an instant's believing end the guilty past, and commence a holy future? It is even so; in one instant a man begins a course of believing which introduces him into a new world. What is strange about this? In the case before us our Lord only said to the demon, "I charge thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him," and the deed was done. If we had all time at our disposal, we could not work such wonders, but to God there are no limits as to length or brevity of time. He speaks, and it is done. Think of it—salvation in a moment!

If we lead our friends out of this difficulty, they plunge into another. They cannot be satisfied with the Word of God alone as the ground for their faith. Why do I believe that I am saved? I know that I am saved because the Word of God says, "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life;" and I do believe in Jesus, and therefore I have everlasting life. "But," saith one, "if I had that word applied to me with power, then I could and would believe it." God must needs give you some pledge or bond beyond His promise, because His word is not good enough for you, though you admit that even with a good man his word is his bond. You cannot trust your God. "Oh, but if I had a dream." Just so. You would have more faith in perhaps caused by indigestion, than you have in the solemn word and written promise of God.

"Oh, sir, but if an angel were to speak to me, I could believe." Just so; and if God does not choose to send the angels, what then? Then He is not to be believed, but treated as a liar. What is this but saying, "Lord, Thou shalt bow to my whims, or else I will not believe a word Thou sayest?" If all the angels in heaven were to march by me in a file, and assure me that God would keep His word, I should say, "I did not require you to tell me that, for the Lord never fails to be as good as His word." God is so true that the witness of angels would be a superfluity. If my father were to make a statement, I certainly should not call in his servant to confirm it.

If we compel them to own that the Word of God is the only and sufficient basis of faith, they straightway begin to look at their own believing as if it were the Saviour. They cry, "My faith is so weak; my faith is so variable; my faith is so shaken," and so forth. It is as if those who were bidden to look to the brazen serpent had, instead thereof, tried to see their own eyes. Here is a child thirsty, and there is a flowing fountain; you give the child a cup that it may drink of the water. The child does not go to the fountain, but is so pleased with its empty cup that it tries to satisfy its thirst out of it. What a foolish child! Faith is the cup, but Christ is the fountain. Faith is a secondary thing compared with Christ. We must have faith to be as the finger with which we touch the hem of the Master's garment, but the finger does not work the cure. Sinner, get you to Christ somehow, anyhow; for if you get to Him you will live. It is not, after all, the greatness nor the perfection of your faith, it is His greatness and His perfection which is to be depended on.

Then the next trial is, that we cannot get troubled sinners to see the difference between their faith and its fruits. "I would believe in Christ," says one, "if I were as holy as So-and-So, who is a believer, but then you see I am a sinner." Now mark, dear friend, that the person of whom you speak in that fashion does not think himself to be one particle more deserving than you are. If you talk to that good man he will tell you that whatever holiness you can see in him is the work of grace, and that at the first he came to Jesus just as you must come, that is, as a sinner. Faith produces holiness; but when we come to Jesus, at the first we come as unholy persons, and as such He receives us.

Suppose that I have a number of which I am told will produce most remarkable flowers; if I believe the statement I shall take care to have them properly planted. The gardeners are beginning to put such things into pots, that they may have hyacinths and other fair flowers in the winter and early spring. Suppose that I resolve not to plant my bulbs, because I use my own eyesight, and come to the conclusion that as I cannot see a hyacinth or even the beginnings of one in any of the bulbs, therefore there can be no use in planting them. Why, every one would tell me that in this matter I must go by faith, and plant my hyacinth in order that I may in due time see it bloom. "That bulb will yield a beautiful blue flower," says one. I answer that it is a brown, dried-up sort of onion, and that I shall throw it on the dunghill, for I can see no bud or flower in it. What a simpleton I should be if I talked so! Though I cannot see it, yet there is, closely compacted and quietly hidden away within that bulb, a slumbering thing of beauty which will wake up at the call of spring. Even so, if thou believest in Christ, there is a holy life packed away within thy faith, and it will gradually develop itself. Even within a feeble faith there are the elements of ultimate perfection.

Still we find the awakened ones clinging to the idea that they must be something or feel something before they may trust Jesus. We cannot get them to see that the whole of their salvation lies in Jesus Christ and in Jesus Christ alone. We cannot wean them from some sort of reliance upon their own feelings, or weepings, or prayers, or Bible-readings, or some other form of working. Why, they will even look to their own faith rather than to Jesus Christ alone. Know ye not that our Lord has offered a full atonement for sin, and brought in a perfect righteousness for His people? His propitiation is to be accepted as full and complete, and His righteousness we are to wear as our own. Our whole trust must go to the perfect work of our Lord, it must not even rest on our faith. To trust in our own trusting would be absurd.

WHAT MAKES FAITH EASY.

III. We must now speak to the last point. Oh, you that are seeking rest, dwell upon each word as it is now lovingly delivered to you. What is it that can make faith easy? The Holy Spirit alone can do that; but He does so by bringing certain truths to remembrance. Faith is rendered easy to a man by the Holy Spirit when, first of all, he sees clearly the infallible certainty of the sacred record; and this is the record that God gave concerning His Son, that he that believeth in Him hath everlasting life. If God hath spoken then questions are ended. It may be a hard saying, it may be a dark saying; it may seem to be too good to be true; but what of that? Do we dare to question the Lord?

The next thing that the Spirit of God helps us to see is the applicability of that record to ourselves; that is to say, we read, "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners," and we conclude that, as we are just such, we may look to Him to save us. We see that the Gospel is directed to us, and so we receive it. It is better for us that the promise should be directed to us in terms of character than that it should mention our actual names. Is your name John Brown? Well, if the Gospel came in a letter to you, directed to John Brown, what might you not say if you were tempted to doubt? You would think to yourself that there are many more John Browns beside yourself, and there the message might not be for you. If it was directed to your address, you might then fear that another John Brown once lived at that house, and so you would fear to appropriate the message. If you mean to ride on the back of unbelief any fancy will do for a saddle. But when the promise comes "to him that believeth in Jesus," there can be no question that it is ours if we believe.

Another great help to faith is to perceive the completeness of the divine work and sacrifice of the Lord Jesus. He took our sin upon Himself, and in His own body on the tree was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Only let your eyes behold the Son of God suffering the death-agony for guilty man, and you must believe in His power to redeem. No limit can be set to the power which lies in the divine expiation. My God, I see that Thou hast given Thine own Son to die, and surely in His precious blood there is more than sufficient reason for my faith in Thee.

If that does not lead you to believe perhaps the Spirit of God will go to work in another way. Some have been helped to believe in Jesus by the sight of others converted, justified, and made happy. When some one like yourself is saved you take courage. "I have been a thief," says one.

> "The dying thief rejoiced to see
> That fountain in his day;
> And there may you, though vile as he,
> Wash all your sins away."

"I have been an adulterer," saith one. Alas! so was David, but he said, "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." "I have been a murderer," sobs a third. So was Manasseh, who shed innocent blood very much. "But I have been a persecutor and a blasphemer." So was Saul of Tarsus, yet he obtained mercy. "But I seem to have far more of the devil in me than anybody else." So had Mary Magdalene, out of whom Christ cast seven devils. You think you are a sinner all by yourself, but there have been others like you, and the door through which others have passed into mercy is open for you.

Lastly, I will tell you one thing which will make you trust Him, and that is, desperation as to all other hopes. It is a singular thing that despair is often but the mother dies when the child is born. We were many of us led to believe in Jesus because we had nothing else to trust in. When we are driven to the last extremity, then it is we come to Jesus, and take Him to be our all in all. A boy was awakened in a house which had taken fire. He could be seen from the street, poor child, and his danger was great indeed. He rushed to the window; his father stood below and called to him to drop into his arms; but it was a long way down, and the child was afraid. He clung to the window, but dared not drop. Do you know what made him let go his hold and fall into his father's arms? There came a burst of fire out of the window and scorched him, and then he dropped directly. I wish that some of you would get just such a touch of the fires of despair as to compel you to say:

THE MOTHER OF FAITH,

> "I can but perish if I go;
> I am resolved to try,
> For if I stay away I know
> I must forever die."

Years ago one of our students was greatly emaciated with what seemed to be consumption. He had heard of a certain medicine which was said to be useful in such cases, but he had no faith in it. When he was growing worse and worse I said, "Brother, you are at death's door; try that man's stuff. There may be something in it. At any rate, nothing else does you any good." He took the medicine through sheer despair, of all other prescriptions, and God blessed it to him so that he is alive at this day. He would never have tried the remedy if he had not felt that there was no other hope. Even so, it will be well for you to be driven into a corner as to your soul's estate, that you may believe in Christ Jesus and say with His disciples in old time, "To whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." Here is a closing verse for you to sing at home by yourself:

> "A guilty, weak, and helpless worm,
> On Christ's kind arms I fall;
> He is my strength and righteousness,
> My Jesus and my all."

MRS. SHIPMAN,

Gospel Temperance Evangelist.

THE young English lady whose portrait appears on the next page, has received a cordial welcome from the workers in various departments of Christian enterprise in New York City. She is now engaged in a successful work among the colored population in Twenty-sixth Street, which she undertook at the conclusion of the special services at the Forsyth Street Church. She has now accepted engagements which will occupy her time until April 8th, 1884.

It is somewhat remarkable that a comparative stranger should have so quickly fallen into active service in America. It proves how universal of application is the message which is delivered by Mrs. Shipman and other Christian temperance workers. This lady, with her strongly marked English accent, a stranger to America and American modes of thought, is heard with attention, her appeals meet with ready response, and she is urged by those interested in the welfare of the poor and degraded to extend the sphere of her labors. Sin works the same havoc here as it does on the other side the Atlantic. Mrs. Shipman has learned by her active work in the great cities of England, how dire that havoc is; she knows that there is but one efficient remedy, and that if that remedy is preached in an attractive way it will be gladly accepted by the lost and degraded. It is that conviction, that strong faith in the power of the Gospel to save, that gives force to her addresses, and which underlies her success. She is, of course, aided by natural gifts, which God uses for His glory. She has a powerful, musical, well-trained voice and a ready flow of language. The pathos of her appeals, her simple unaffected eloquence, and her gentle, affectionate pleading, especially with those of her own sex, have combined, under God's blessing, to win many souls for Him. We trust that her visit may continue to bring forth fruit.

As Mrs. Shipman has already made many friends here and is likely to make many more as she travels through the States, the following narrative of her life, which we take from the London Blue Ribbon Official Gazette, will be welcome:

Minerva Fanny Shipman (née Allen) was born in Nottingham, August 4th, 1854. She is, therefore, now in her thirtieth year. Her mother was a Christian woman, who ardently prayed for the salvation of her children. Minerva was very young when she first felt the strivings of the Holy Spirit. While still but a child she heard a sermon by the Rev. Joseph Hargreaves, in a Wesleyan Chapel, in Manchester, to which city her parents had removed, which greatly affected her. The impression then made was deepened and she was led in her youth to give her heart to the Saviour.

YOUTHFUL LABOR.

Having experienced the joy of conversion herself, she set about, child as she was, to make known the glad tidings to others. Procuring some tracts she visited the people, from house to house, inviting them to attend the revival services, and she was rewarded by several persons accepting her invitation, a number of whom found peace. She also called upon several sick women whom she knew, to whom the child's visits, her singing of Christian hymns, and her reading of the Bible, were a very welcome relief in the tedium of illness. In more than one case death found the sufferers prepared by the child's ministrations for the final change. The prophecy was fulfilled: "A little child had led them."

In 1873, Minerva Allen lost her eldest sister, who had been a very pious and devout Christian. The circumstances of her death, which were very sudden, powerfully affected her and led her to place work for God before her heart as the highest and noblest occupation in which she could engage, and from that time forward she sought opportunities for Christian labor. The family about this time left the Wesleyan branch of the Methodist Church and became connected with the Primitive Methodists, in which female agency is more largely employed, and Miss Allen's opportunities increased.

FIRST PUBLIC SERVICE.

Some Christian people in Manchester, concerned over the Christless condition of the working population in Manchester, opened a mission hall, and speakers were needed who, leaving the set style of sermons, would simply talk to the people about the Saviour. The people who attended did not want to hear doctrines expounded or to learn what was the typical meaning of the Tabernacle with its poles and silver sockets, or to listen to ingenious applications of Solomon's song to the Church; they were sinners, and knew they were sinners, and they needed some one to tell them of the love of God to the lost and of the Saviour's inexhaustible sympathy, self-sacrifice, and divine tenderness. So, simple, earnest Christians were sought for, who could tell that story—the grandest human lips can utter.

Among others Miss Allen was invited. The invitation was very pleasant, for the work would be congenial to her, but she had never spoken in public, and she shrank with maidenly diffidence from the undertaking. It was only for a brief moment, however. Ought she to refuse to speak of a Saviour's love to the perishing, she asked herself, and throwing herself on her knees she asked divine guidance and strength, and it was given. She went to the mission and spoke simply and forcibly, and God blessed her words.

From that time forward she never shrank from public speaking. The success of her efforts was noised abroad, and people spoke of her as of one who made no display of her talents, but who, following the divine direction, exalted Christ and tried to bring sinners to Him. So few speakers are content to do that simply and earnestly, that Miss Allen's services were in demand, and she received and accepted invitations to hold meetings in London and other large cities. These services were owned and blessed of God; in one town alone 195 persons publicly confessed Christ as the result of the service.

MARRIAGE AND BEREAVEMENT.

In the course of her labors Miss Allen formed the acquaintance of Mr. William Shipman, the friend and Christian helper of the destitute children of Manchester. A common feeling of love to the poor and a kindred spirit of Christian faith and work drew the two laborers together, and developed into affection. They were married on February 19th, 1878. The period of their united labors was short. In the fall of 1880 Mr. Shipman was stricken with illness, and for nine months suffered great pain, which he bore with patience supported by the consolations of the Gospel. He died Feburary 21st, 1881, rejoicing in his Saviour. A deep peace was upon him in his last moments, which occasionally gave place to a triumphant utterance as he caught glimpses of the glory beyond.

The shock of her husband's death for a time prostrated the young widow, but soon the call to work rang in her ears and aroused a prompt response. Overcoming the grief that would have compelled silence, she once more commenced her mission work, and has been enabled to continue it to the present time. When the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army was organized through the efforts of Rev. M. Baxter, Mrs. Shipman became one of the most earnest and zealous workers, and she ultimately took charge of the important station at York. There she met with much success, and worked indefatigably among the outcasts of society. At length, continuous effort rendered a brief change of scene necessary, and Mrs. Shipman decided on visiting America. The Blue Ribbon Official Gazette says: "She leaves England amid the prayers of God's people, who will heartily welcome her back whenever she returns to her native shores."

PERCY SELWYN'S DIFFICULTY SOLVED.

ALONG the gravel paths of a beautiful, well-kept garden, a young man was walking with quick, nervous steps, early one summer morning. He was tall and muscular, was fashionably dressed, and had on his head the Glengarry cap, then becoming a favorite country head-gear among young city men. He was evidently waiting for some one, for at every turn he glanced anxiously in one direction. "What can be keeping her?" he muttered. "It must be half an hour past the time," and he glanced at his watch. "No, it is not," he said; "why, it is not seven yet. I never knew half an hour pass so slowly before. Nothing like suspense to lengthen time. Who knows, perhaps a lifetime of suspense would make a man feel that he had lived as long as Methusaleh. Ah! here she comes, punctual as the sun."

As he spoke, a young lady appeared on the path which led from a large house hidden among the trees. The resemblance between the two indicated that they were brother and sister. But the family features had not turned out so attractively when cast in the feminine mould, for the lady could not, even by a favorable observer, have been called good-looking. The fact appeared to be admitted by the lady herself, for Mary Selwyn had made no attempt at adornment; her hair and her dress were severely plain, and gave her a Quakerish, Puritanic appearance. But the young man greeted her as warmly as if she had been the most beautiful, fashionably attired belle in the world.

"Well, my sage adviser," he said, "I have been anxiously waiting for you. "Now, I will lay the whole case before you as I promised you I would last night, and you shall tell me what I ought to do. You see, I keep up our old relations; I am bringing you my manhood difficulties to solve, just as I did my school-boy troubles. I am bound to say that your advice is not always pleasant, but it is always right. Where do you get your wisdom?"

"You know that source, Percy," she said. "I am not wise, but I seek wisdom where it is to be had and where you might have it too if you would only ask for it. I have been praying now for more than an hour, and I feel confident God has heard me, and will help me to advise you rightly. But I do not know yet what the difficulty is. Your words frightened me last night, but they were so vague I could not even guess the cause of your trouble."

"Well, Mary, wherever you get your wisdom from, I hope it will serve now, though I fancy our philosophers would not agree with you in your notion. This is the trouble: You know or guess that in Chicago I have rather a fast set of friends. I often have reason to despise them, but they are amusing, and they are in the best society, and they are very difficult to shake off. I have at times, chiefly through your influence, tried to withdraw myself, but it has never been successful, and they have always hunted me up. About three months ago one of them came to my boarding-house to inquire after me, and as I was out at the time, but had said I should return soon, he sat down to wait for me. While he waited he made the acquaintance of Mabel Foster, my landlady's pretty daughter. He certainly did not have more than half an hour's talk with her then, but on one pretext or other he has visited the house very often since, and I suppose has cultivated her acquaintance. Anyhow, last week she left her home, and it has been found out that she has gone away with him, deluded, I expect, by a sham marriage. Her mother is broken-hearted. She does not blame me, of course, but she knows, and I know, that I am indirectly the cause of her trouble. Now, I have ascertained that the girl is living not more than a mile away from here at a hotel to which the scoundrel has taken her. Now, if I go there and upbraid him and expostulate with Mabel I shall only get myself into a quarrel and possibly a scandal, too. If I tell her mother where they are the old lady will go down and make a scene, and probably do no good. Yet I cannot let things alone. It is a monstrous crime, it ought not to go on. Tell me, Mary, what I ought to do."

Mary Selwyn put a few questions to her brother as to details, and then quietly said she would go herself and see the erring girl. "I must tell papa about it," she said, "because since mamma's death he cannot endure for me to go out of his sight. You will go back to-day to the city, and in a few days I will write you how I have prospered."

"Thank you, Mary; God bless you for your sweet compassion. Mabel is harder than I believe if she can resist you."

Three days afterward Percy Selwyn received a letter from his sister, giving no details, but bidding him reassure Mrs. Foster and encourage her to hope that her daughter would eventually be restored to her. Two weeks passed away, and then another letter came. Mary Selwyn begged her brother to come home for a day. He went, and there to his surprise found Mabel Foster by his sister's side, a penitent, humble sinner, reclaimed by sisterly pleading and prayer. Mary Selwyn accompanied her brother back to the city, and there prepared the stricken mother to receive her wandering daughter. Mary and Mrs. Foster returned together, and in that same garden in which Percy and his sister had discussed the trouble, the mother clasped in her arms her lost treasure, rescued for her by the blessing of God on the exertions of a faithful, praying Christian girl.

Bess Goes into Business.

AMONG all the social problems of the present day there is none more important than that of rendering assistance to the honest poor. There are in every great city hundreds of people anxious to support themselves by honest industry, yet who are unable to do so for lack of opportunity. Among them are women like Mrs. Fell and her children. If her husband had lived she would have been a respectable, happy woman, and her children would have easily earned a livelihood as they grew up. But with her husband dead and her own health shattered, what could she do? A very little money—less than many a man wastes in a single day—would have enabled her to place both her children in the way of earning their means of living, and have relieved her of the distress of seeing her son sent to prison for begging and her daughter exposed to nameless temptation. A little timely assistance, rendered judiciously, would save from ruin to-day thousands, who to-morrow may take their first step into dishonest courses. To-day they view the dishonest act with horror, but as they sit face to face with poverty, suffering from cold and hunger, or it may be suffering the still worse pang of seeing those they love in want, they seem to be shut up to a choice of evils, and they choose dishonesty rather than starvation. To such, and there are many such near to us all, a little help, ever so small a gift, may turn the scale, and they may be saved from sin. Even poor old Euclid could give that, poor as he was, and he did. How much better able are others who, while calling themselves Christians, forget the Saviour's injunction to those who would follow Him. (Luke 14: 12 14.)

Bess had not forgotten that the redemption of her mother's wedding-ring rested upon her, and that she had pledged herself to get it out of pawn. She tried in various ways to get some work to do; but she had neither strength nor skill to make her work valuable. At last she took counsel with Victoria, who proposed to her to go out selling water-cresses like her father; and he offered to take her with him to the market where he bought his daily supply, and start her on a beat of her own, apart from him, as he could not afford to divide his customers and his profits. A few pence would set her up in this line of business; and with diligence, she might earn sufficient to keep herself, and redeem the ring.

It may be pleasant to rise at four o'clock in June, and, quitting the thick and nauseous atmosphere of the overcrowded and unventilated dwelling-place, to escape into the sweet dewy freshness of the early morning, which, even in the streets, is scented with the breath of country hay-fields and blossoming gardens; but four o'clock on a winter's morning, when Bess hurriedly dressed herself, without a light, in the thin and tattered clothes, which were all she had, and thrust her naked feet into her mother's old boots; and, kissing her mother, who must lie still and lonely till she came back, stepped out into the half-slush, half-frost of the pavement, and the biting air—this was a sharp test of her endurance.

But Euclid was waiting for her with his basket, and she trudged along at his side through the slush and the frost, carrying an old battered tea-tray a neighbor had lent her the night before. It was nearly three miles to the market. Early as the hour was, and dark as midnight still, life had begun again at the East End of London; and many a shivering fellow-being, shuffling along the slippery pavement, and maintaining a sombre silence, passed them like ghosts. Bess had never been out at this hour before, and she kept close to Euclid's side.

The old man, too, was silent; he felt put out by the presence of a companion. For twenty-five years, ever since he had recovered partially from the accident that disabled him as a laborer, he had taken this walk alone through summer and winter; and it was bewildering to him to hear the light footsteps of Bess pattering beside him. He had so long lived altogether without intercourse with his neighbors, that he was surprised, and not altogether pleased, to find himself taking an interest in Mrs. Fell and David and Bess. Might not such an interest come between him and the sole aim of his life? For, if he yielded too much to the stirrings of compassion and pity in his heart, some danger might arise to his slowly accumulated hoard, now lying safely under Victoria's head.

Yet Euclid felt that he could not stand by and see his neighbor die of starvation under his very eyes. No, no: that could never be. He glanced at Bess, as they passed beneath a lamp, and caught a half-smile of trustfulness in him shining in her eyes, like the look of his little children, dead long ago, who had been used to run to meet him when they heard his foot on the stairs. They were all gone to heaven now, where his wife was. He had no idea of heaven beyond a vague fancy dwelling in his brain, that there would be somewhere—out of the world or in the world, he did not know—a little cottage on a hillside, such as the early home he dimly remembered, where they would all live together again, and where there would be no winter, and no more hunger or sorrow; no parish pay, and no poorhouse. His lost wife would be young again, and all his children little ones; and there would be a garden for him to work in, lying round the cottage. That was Euclid's heaven.

He was still dreaming of it when they reached the market, and joined a crowd of old folks and young children waiting for the gates to be opened. It was not yet five o'clock, and the yellow glare of a few gas-lamps shed a dim light upon the scene. The crowd was very quiet and subdued. All who were there were feeble folk, and did not care to waste their strength in noise and pushing. As each old person or little child came, they took their place as near to the gate as they could get; and most of them sank into silent waiting. The poorest of the decent poor were there—those who were willing to struggle to the bitter end to earn an honest living, and retain their dearly prized independence by keeping out of the poorhouse. Euclid did as the rest did, and, with Bess beside him, stood in patient muteness till he could make his purchases for the day.

As soon as the gates were opened, there was a quiet crush through them. Euclid took more care in buying a stock of cresses for Bess than for himself; though he was fastidious in his choice, passing from hamper to hamper, and peering closely at the green leaves to detect any specks upon them. As soon as his purchases were made, he hurried Bess away to the steps of a church close by, where he showed her how to make up her bunches, and slung the old tray round her neck by a bit of cord he drew out of his pocket.

"Now we must be as sharp as needles and pins," he said. "I've heard somewhere of a early bird as picked up a early worm. Folks'll be gettin' their breakfasses soon, and we must be in time to catch 'em at it. Don't you waste your time along the bettermost streets, Bess; but stick to the courts and the mewses and the streets where workin' men live. Rich folks ain't thinkin' o' gettin' out o' bed yet; and they don't eat creases for breakfast, but ham and eggs, and hot things. Mewses are good places in general. Walk pretty slow, two mile an hour; and keep your eye on the doors and windows for fear somebody's beckonin' at you. There now! I'll stand at the end o' this here street, and hearken how you can cry, 'Creases! Fresh water-creases!' till you're out o' my sight."

Euclid stood watching Bess, with her trayful of cresses, as she paced slowly along the street, her clear, pleasant voice singing, rather than crying, the familiar words. Then he turned away with a heavy sigh. His own voice sounded husky and hollow in his ears as he shambled along his customary beat, drawling mournfully, "Cre-she! cre-she!" He felt an older man than usual, as though some additional burden of years had suddenly fallen upon his bent shoulders and bowed-down head. Yet he was only in his sixtieth year, and there was much work and much power of endurance left in him still. He had never starved quite as much as he could; and his old clothing had never been as utterly tattered as they might be. But he saw depths of poverty below even him; and for once his heart felt heavy enough to sink him and Victoria into those lowest deeps.

"The parish!" he muttered to himself half aloud, as he rested his dry throat for a minute or two. "The parish! And be parted from her! Not bury Victoria in her own coffin, like the rest of 'em! The parish! God help these old legs o' mine!"

As if some new strength had been breathed into him, Euclid started on again, crying his street-cry with more energy than before. The thought of the parish had run like a stimulant through his whole frame. He had better success than usual, and sold so many bunches of cresses that he felt justified in buying one of the best of Yarmouth bloaters, which he chose with close cautiousness, as if he was difficult to please, at a shop he passed on his way home. It was for a relish for Victoria's tea, more than for himself. He had not made much by his day's toil and his ten miles' tramp through the slushy streets; but, after he had taken enough for the day's food and rent, there was a little silver coin or two to add to the store.

"Let us look over our little store," he said, when their leisurely tea was ended.

He was counting up the coins on the empty soap-box, turned on end, which served as a table when it was not wanted as a seat, when a low knock was heard at the door. There was neither lock nor latch upon it, the sole fastening being a stick passed through a staple and holdfast within. But there was no other room in the roof, and the steep ladder-like staircase was seldom trodden by any one but themselves. Euclid made haste to gather the money into the handkerchief that usually held it, before Victoria opened the door. But Bess, who was the untimely visitor, had already seen the heap of coins through a chink in the old door, and heard their jingle as Euclid swept them out of sight. She stood thunderstruck on the door-sill, gazing in with large, wide-open eyes.

"What is it, Bess?" asked Victoria.

"Oh, mother's sent me up to say as I've had good luck," she stammered, "and it's thanks to you, Mr. Euclid; and, oh, please may I go again to-morrow morning?"

"Ay, child," answered Euclid shortly.

Bess went down-stairs with a far slower step than she had gone up. Never in her life had she seen so much money at one time as when she had put her eye to the chink in the door, and peeped in on her friends. It seemed to her as if the whole end of the soap-box had been covered with it. Mr. Euclid, in spite of his old clothing, was then a rich man!

If such riches could be made by selling watercresses, then she too was on the high road to be rich. Already to-day she had earned more money than she had ever owned before; and her mother had smiled for the first time since David went out begging when she poured the pence into her lap. Like Euclid, she had trudged through the mud of the partially frozen streets for nine or ten miles, besides her walk to the market; and her limbs were weary, and her throat somewhat tired. But her heart was very light. Then the wonderful sight of heaps of money on Euclid's table had dazzled her. Why had they never thought of this trade before? A thousand pities it was; for, if they had begun early enough, she and David might now have heaps of money too, like Euclid and Victoria.

Bess was up again before four o'clock in the morning, and was waiting for Euclid when he came down-stairs. She was eager to be away making her fortune. By and by Euclid grew used to her company, and liked to hear her talk as she tripped along by his side. Morning after morning, through darkness and frost, snow and fog, the gray-headed man and the young girl started off on their toilsome tramp—the one with the uncomplaining fortitude of old age, the other with the hopeful courage of youth.

"It'll not be such a lonesome shop when I'm gone now, father," said Victoria one day.

"Why so, Victoria, my dear?" he asked.

"There's Bess," she answered, smiling, but somewhat sadly. "You'll take to her, daddy. You two 'ud be two lonesome ones if you didn't take to one another. Mrs. Fell's very near her end; and I am p'rhaps."

"Do you feel worse, Victoria?" he inquired anxiously.

"Not worse," she said; "but it's so long, the winter is; and there's so much dark, and I lie here doin' nothin'. If it wasn't for mother's verses and hymns, I don't know what I'd do. I've been sayin' one of 'em all day."

"Which is it, my dear?" he asked.

Victoria's voice fell into a low and solemn tone as she said these words:

"There is a house, not made with hands,
Eternal and on high;
And here my spirit waiting stands
Till God shall bid it fly."

"Ay, she were always a-sayin' them lines," Euclid murmured softly, "afore you was born, my dear."

"There's enough money to pay for my buryin' now, isn't there, father?" asked Victoria.

"To be sure there is, my dear; lots enough," he answered, "and a bit o' black for Bess, if that'll be any comfort to you."

"She's strong, and can help you to get a livin'," observed Victoria, almost joyously; "and there'll be somebody to see as you have a coffin of your own too, daddy. I'm glad to think you'll take to Bess when I'm gone."

"My work'll be done then," said Euclid. "I promised your mother what I'd do, and I've a'most done it. Then I'm ready to go. It's a queer shop, this world is!" and the old man sighed as he made his philosophical observation.

In three calendar months after David Fell was committed to jail for begging, he was released, and sent out again to the old life. He had been regularly supplied with food, kept from the cold of the wintry days and nights, and properly exercised with a careful regard to his health. He had never had three months of so much physical comfort before; and he had grown a good deal both in size and strength. Moreover he had been diligently taught in school, and could read and write very much better, and with more ease, than when he had written his short letter to his mother. He had learned cobbling, and could mend a pair of boots quite creditably. The governor of the jail enumerated these advantages to him as he gave him a few words of parting counsel.

"Now, my lad," he continued, "don't let me see you here again, or hear of you being in trouble elsewhere. This is the second time you've been in jail"—

"Please, sir," interrupted David, with energy, "I never was in jail before. It was another boy, not me. I've done nothin' worse than beggin'."

"Don't go away with a lie on your tongue," said the governor sternly. "It's a sad thing to break the laws of your country; but it's worse to break God's laws. 'Thou shalt not steal! thou shalt not lie!' are His laws. 'Thou shalt not beg,' is your country's law. Keep them in mind, and you'll not get into trouble again."

David heard the prison gate close behind him, leaving him free again in the open streets, with an odd feeling of strangness and timidity mingled with his delight. The other prisoners released at the same time quickly vanished out of sight, as if they did not care to be seen under the jail-walls. But David lingered, half bewildered and half fascinated, gazing up at the strong, grim edifice, with its massive doors and small, closely barred windows. It had been his home for three months. He was no longer a stranger to it or its ways. If he should ever come there again, he could fall at once into its customs and rules, and would need very little, if any, instruction from its warders. Just now it seemed more familiar and less formidable to him than the narrow, dirty, squalid street where his former neighbors lived, and his mother, and little Bess.

He had some miles to go, and it was almost dusk when he reached his own neighborhood. But, though he was stronger and better fitted for labor than when he left it three months ago, he did not turn boldly into the street, whistling some gay tune as he marched along, and calling aloud to this neighbor and that, ready for all sorts of boyish pranks, and equally ready to render little acts of help and kindness to any one who needed them. He waited till night fell, and then went slinking down close to the walls, and keeping as much in the shadow as possible. Blackett's door was open, and he dare not face Blackett. He had always held up his head high above Blackett's sons, except Roger; and he knew both father and sons hated him for it. Did the neighbors know that he had been in prison? If they did not, his closely cropped head, with the dark hair growing like short fur all over it, would betray him at once.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 18. 1 Sam. 16 : 1–13. Golden Text, Psalm 89 : 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Samuel's Unselfish Grief — God's Encouraging Command—Samuel's Fear—Obedience to God Always Safe—Samuel Not to Choose a King—Strength in Weakness—Dependence Necessary to Success—David's Insignificance—Yet Chosen of God—David a Type of Christ—Saul's Mania—David Familiarized with Court Life—Saul's Proxy with God.

In our last lesson we noticed that "Samuel mourned for Saul." Strongly as he had been against the introduction of monarchical government in Israel, yet Samuel had seen Saul a changed man, and acting under the Spirit of God; and now that he was "turned back from following the Lord," Samuel, instead of congratulating himself upon the discernment of spirit which he had possessed, and which had led him to oppose so strenuously the desires of the people, was overcome with grief for that blameworthy Saul—Saul, for whom he himself had been deposed. It was like the Spirit of Christ beforehand, for self was altogether without place.

But God would not have him carry his grief too far; true, He had rejected Saul, but He had not rejected Israel. Then "the Lord said unto Samuel, for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? fill thine horn with oil, and go, I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons." God will not have His people occupied with the past; despondency concerning either ourselves or others, is not of God, it is always the work of the enemy who seeks to occupy us with ourselves, with others, or with circumstances, so that our eye may be off God, and we may be overcome. While it was a lovely manifestation of the Spirit of Christ in Samuel to mourn over Saul his rival, a spirit we would be glad to see more common among us, yet God would not have him under the power of his grief, as though there were no redress. For Saul, indeed, God could not alter the word which was gone out of His mouth, He could not recognize Saul any longer as king, yet we cannot but know that there was forgiveness for him if he had turned again and sought the Lord. This, alas! he did not do.

HOW LONG WILT THOU MOURN

Samuel, however, was God's prophet to Israel, not to Saul alone, and thus he was called on to anoint another, and a better king. But we see the effect of the despondency which had taken possession of him. Fear of man, which during all his long life is not mentioned before, came now to the front. "And Samuel said, How can I go? if Saul hear it, he will kill me." The Lord did not lose patience with His tried and tempted servant, but in His own Fatherly love made the difficult path easy, as He always does when we trust in Him. Happily Samuel carried his difficulty to God and not to man or to his own heart. "The Lord said, Take an heifer with thee, and say, I am come to sacrifice to the Lord. And call Jesse to the sacrifice, and I will shew thee what thou shalt do: and thou shalt anoint unto Me him whom I name unto thee." The Lord had all in hand; what was there to fear? He who sent him was the responsible party. Oh, how God rests the heart which trusts fully in Him! how easy it is when we have to do with God!

Samuel was not slow to obey; he did that which the Lord spake, and came to Bethlehem. But his coming created a sensation; if a prophet comes to a place he must bear a message with him; if a judge comes, there must be some case to be tried; then "the elders of the town trembled at his coming, and said, Comest thou peaceably?" Oh, how blessed when placed in a difficult position to have the Lord's own answer to give! "He said, Peaceably: I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord: sanctify yourselves, and come with me to the sacrifice." Was not this rather dangerous? Might not the publicity of it, when it got to Saul's ears, cause him to be incensed against Samuel, as the promoter of an insurrection against him? Samuel knew, however, that God was responsible for all the consequences of obedience to His own commands. "And he sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice."

The sons of Jesse were before him, but still the choice of

was not deputed to Samuel, the Lord reserved this to Himself. The old prophet was struck by the personal appearance of Eliab, the eldest son. Saul was a goodly person and superior in height to all the men of Israel, and Samuel's ideas of a king were framed on that model, so he said of Eliab, "Surely the Lord's anointed is before Him. But the Lord said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." God sees through and through; not actions only, but the motives from which they spring; not words only, but the very thoughts and secrets of the heart. Man cannot discern, unless by the Spirit of God, how another man stands with God, but "all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do" (Heb. 4 : 13). Had the choice been left to Samuel, he would have made a great mistake in the selection, and have chosen quite otherwise than God, but happily he knew how to trust the Lord for guidance, and he was willing to be led by it.

Oh, how different is God's choice to man's! How apt we are to think that one who possesses certain gifts is the very one for such and such a post. God sees the end from the beginning, and in order to bring us to a point where we are practically crucified with Christ, He has to bring us to the end of all our own power, and let us fail in those very things where we are most conscious of power in order that not we may live, but Christ in us. Thus it often happens that one who is not at all gifted, and who knows it, and therefore relies upon God for every simple thing really succeeds better than the most gifted.

THE DISTINGUISHING POINT

in Joseph was not his gifts or talents, but that the Lord was with him, and thus also it was with David. Jesse called Abinadab, then Shammah, then seven of his sons with the same result. "The Lord hath not chosen these." The old prophet was quite sure that the future king must be one of the sons of Jesse the Lord never deceived him, then he inquired, "Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and, behold, he keepeth the sheep." A young nobody! one not supposed old enough to have anything to do with politics and national affairs, not even necessarily present as a member of the family when a family gathering or sacrifice was held! Yet

THIS WAS THE LORD'S CHOICE.

Samuel, God's chosen from a child, could understand it, and said, "Send and fetch him: for we will not sit down till he be come hither." David was brought in, all unconscious yet of what awaited him. He had not the height nor imposing appearance of his elder brother, but there was a beauty of another order, "he was ruddy and withal of a beautiful countenance [or fair of eyes], and goodly to look to." But beyond this there was a heart right with God; this was his real fitness, he would be a pliable instrument in the hands of God. And the Lord said, Arise, anoint him, for this is he. All through this time Samuel was not debating with his own mind as to which was the probable choice of God, he was not striving in some way to discover, but just simply listening to God. And although surrounded with people, sights and sounds going on all the time, the practised inner ear of Samuel knew the voice of the Lord above all. "Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren." David is

A TYPE OF CHRIST,

God's anointed. He is God's choice, that which pleases God is not some speciality in us, but Christ in us; it is Christ in us who is anointed with the Holy Ghost, our nature cannot take the anointing. The holy anointing oil was not to be poured upon the flesh of man (Ex. 30 : 32). This is what man cannot understand; it cuts at the root of all human pride. It is flattering to the pride of human nature to think that goodness can exist independently of God. Some will recognize it as His gift, but not see that "there is none good but God," and that, therefore, only Himself is really good, and only as He dwells in us can we be good. Man evades the personality of God, slips away from having to do with Him, man by nature is ready to acknowledge Him at a distance, but shrinks from the touch of God, the voice of God, the presence of God.

From that day forward the Spirit of the Lord came upon David. "But the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him:" as he had desired, appearances were kept up, but all communication between him and God was at an end; his power was only an outward semblance, a kind of sham. Saul's servants pitied the poor helpless king who was under the dominion of an evil spirit, and proposed as a remedy that a man who could play well should be sought for so that through the power of music the mania which possessed the king might be subdued. This was which God made for introducing David at court, where he might learn the ways and customs of court life, and so be prepared for the future to which he was called. Saul gladly assented, and gave orders accordingly. Then, one of his servants suggested that David, the son of Jesse, should be appointed to the post, saying that he was "cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, prudent in matters, and a comely person, and

THE LORD IS WITH HIM."

Nothing could seem more desirable; at this time it is not likely that Saul knew anything about the anointing of David to the kingdom, so Saul sent to Jesse for David, his son. A king was despotic in those days, and Jesse sent his son to the king, and with him a present.

It must have been a strange thing for David to enter that very court as the king's musician, when God had called him to reign. "David came to Saul, and stood before him: and he loved him greatly; and he became his armor bearer." Saul desired David to remain at court, "and it came to pass, when the evil spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took a harp, and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him." Thus God permitted him to have an influence over Saul, and that Saul should be in a measure dependent upon him. Poor Saul! dependent upon another to bring him in any sense near to God. Let us learn the lesson, to deal personally with God continually, lest we too fall into Saul's terrible error and its fearful consequences.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Two Startling Explosions Occurred in London on the night of Tuesday, October 30th. As a train was passing about eight o'clock through the tunnel of the Underground Railroad, which runs nearly around the city, a violent explosion shattered the windows of the cars, threw the conductors off their feet, and put out all the lights in the train. The utmost alarm prevailed, and the shrieks of passengers, wounded by splinters of wood and pieces of glass, increased the panic. The train was near the Praed St. Station when the explosion occurred, and it proceeded on to the Edgeware Road Station, where an examination was made, and the wounded people, about forty in number, were carried to the hospitals. The two rear carriages of the train were reduced to mere skeletons; the wood-work of the roof of the tunnel was pulverized, and the sleepers under the roadbed were torn up and split in pieces. In the solid masonry of the tunnel a hole was found about the size of a man's hat. A chemical analysis of the wreck shows that the disaster was caused by an explosive compound, and not by gas, as was at first suggested. Almost simultaneously a similar explosion took place on the same road near Charing Cross, but that was less destructive in its effects. Public opinion in London is unanimous in attributing the outrage to the Irish, and that belief is confirmed by the fact that at the very moment it occurred, Michael Davitt was publicly declaring that "the war must be fought in England, and fought it will be." There is no clue to the perpetrators at present, but the detectives are at work on the case, and the Houses of Parliament and public buildings are being closely guarded. The outrage is peculiarly dastardly, as the perpetrators must have been aware that the principal sufferers would be inoffensive women and children. It is urged on that ground that it is unlikely to have been committed by Irishmen, but when it is remembered that they were capable of maiming cattle and mixing needle-points with the fodder of horses, it is evident that the fact of a crime being cowardly would not deter them from committing it.

The Parnellites in Ireland Appear to be amazed by the attitude of their fellow-countrymen belonging to the Orange Lodges. The Orangemen have developed an hostility and a violence to the League more bitter than Englishmen are wont to display. A riot occurred at Londonderry between the two factions on November 1st. The Lord Mayor of Dublin, who is a stanch supporter of the League, had arranged to deliver a lecture in the Town Hall of Londonderry; but when he arrived there his procession was attacked by an Orange mob, shots were fired, and two persons fatally wounded. They then took possession of the City Hall, and climbed on the roof, on which they planted a Union Jack. They threw slates from the roof at the Lord Mayor's procession, and it was finally decided that the lecture must be delivered elsewhere. The military had to be called out before order was restored. The conduct of the Orangemen was disgraceful, and excited the bitterest indignation among the Parnellites, who appear to consider that rioting and murder are an infringement on their rights. The demonstration proves that lawlessness is rampant in Ireland, and has now affected the classes of the population hitherto remarkable for their good behavior.

The Negotiations between France and China have been complicated by a personal dispute. During the debate in the French Chambers on the Tonquin question, Premier Ferry, quoting a despatch from M. Tricou, the French Minister in China, averred that Li Hung Chang, the Viceroy of Canton, disavowed the action of Marquis Tseng, who represents China at the French and English capitals, and disowns him as a representative of China. The Marquis Tseng apparently believes that the statements of M. Tricou are either pure fabrications or misrepresentations of the Viceroy's words. He contends that he and the Viceroy hold identical views as to the French movements in Tonquin, and that, moreover, the Viceroy has no authority in the matter, but is equally bound with himself to obey the same orders issued to both. M. Clemenceau made a vigorous speech against warlike operations, but on a vote being taken the Chambers formally indorsed the action of the government. War is now regarded as inevitable.

A Rumor that Negotiations are Pending Between France and Madagascar for a treaty of peace is in circulation. It was generally discredited at its first appearance, owing to the habitual duplicity of the French Government. But more recently the British Foreign Office has received confirmatory advices under date of October 31st, from Zanzibar, stating that the delegates of the Hova Government are negotiating a treaty with Admiral Galiber. The Protestant missionaries advise the Queen of the Hovas to conclude as a basis of peace a treaty, ceding a small strip of the southwest coast to France with a protectorate over the Sakelaves. The Admiral promises an immediate evacuation of Tamatave on the signing of such a treaty, but France, he insists, must hold the Customs port of Najunga until the payment of the indemnity.

Queen Victoria's Hatred of Gambling has just received an illustration in the fact, as stated by a society journal, that she "has issued, or is about to issue, a private 'memorandum' enjoining the occupants of certain royal palaces, who by her favor are allowed to live there rent free, to 'the correction and reformation of their manners and excesses.' Recent events have brought to Her Majesty's knowledge the fact that in one of her palaces gambling has been regularly going on to an almost incredible extent. Not only has something more than inconvenience been caused by the enormous sums which have been lost and won, but an additional scandal has been brought about by the fact that the ardent players were wont to continue their amusement well into the morning of Sunday."

The International Convention of Workingmen, which has been holding its sessions in Paris, was expected to formulate a platform which would unite the workingmen of the whole world in one federal organization through their separate unions. But dissensions have arisen which prove that there are irreconcilable differences between the English and Continental artisans, the one advocating independent combination subscriptions and peaceful agitation, the others State socialism and violent revolution.

Mr. Moody Successfully Opened his Great mission at Islington in the north of London last Sunday, November 4th. Four meetings were held, each of which was attended by from four to six thousand persons. The iron hall built for the occasion proved to be a complete success in all its arrangements, affording seating room for fifty-eight hundred persons. All around on the sides of the hall appropriate texts were displayed. A cablegram from London says: "Mr. Sankey sang with customary effect. Mr. Moody's powerful addresses showed that he had not lost his hold on the people here. One hundred persons rose to be prayed for. A number of prominent clergymen occupied seats on the platform during the day and evening services. Mr. Moody, alluding to his mission in Ireland, said that his three weeks' work in that country had been the most productive of his life. At the close of the evening meeting a man in the hall shouted out that Mr. Moody's last mission in London had been a failure. Mr. Moody answered by calling for volunteers to come out boldly on the Lord's side, whereupon about three thousand men arose en masse. The incident caused much excitement.

The Riotous Demonstration Against Messrs. Moody and Sankey in Ireland appears to have been easily suppressed. A magistrate, who was present when the crowd around the doors of the building in which the meetings were held became demonstrative, sent for an additional force of policemen to keep order. Persons entering the hall were hissed, and stones were thrown at the police, but no actual injury was done, and the rioters eventually dispersed. Messrs. Moody and Sankey proceeded to Waterford at the conclusion of the services at Cork. Major Whittle continued the services at Limerick while the two evangelists were at Cork, and it is expected that he will follow them from place to place in the campaign to organize a permanent local evangelistic work in each place, so that the enthusiasm aroused may take practical shape in the churches.

Mr. Von Schluembach, whose Work among German young men in New York is still remembered with thankfulness, has been laboring with success in Berlin. In describing his work in the German capital at a meeting in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association in London recently, he said that when he went to Berlin he was greatly helped by one of the pastors there. They were able to open little meetings in lager-beer rooms and other places. He thanked God he could report many cases of thieves and notorious sinners who have been regenerated, and were leading a new life. He did not hold after-meetings, but his house was an after-meeting the whole day long. Eternity alone could reveal the tale of what it was his privilege to know in that way of the saving power of God. Every night, toward the close of the work, they had audiences of fifteen or eighteen hundred, and many seeking the Lord. The meetings were still going on with good success.

The Works of the French Purveyor of Literary filth, which are exposed on all our bookstalls and their translations sold freely to boys and girls here, to corrupt their minds, have been seized and destroyed by the authorities in Berlin. The act is attributed by the French people to the German hatred of France and everything French. There is no need, however, to attribute any such motive, the character of the books, the attractive pictures of vice they contain, and the inducements they hold out to young people to lead vicious lives are a sufficient justification for their seizure. A writer in reviewing one of the works says: "The author of the book is as unclean a writer as ever put pen to paper, and if the municipal authorities of any civilized city are not within their right in prohibiting the publication and sale of his works, it would be difficult to assign any intelligible functions to such authorities."

Evangelistic Work is Making Progress in Spain. Pastor Fliedner, in his last quarterly paper, speaks most hopefully of the state of things from a religious point of view in that country. He says: "New life is coming into a dead people—dead because it wants a Christian conscience, a conscience which no one has ever awakened. Now, on every hand, there is, movement, weak and feeble, but yet evident and living. It is a new spring, which makes itself manifest; and we can fully and confidently sing, with Luther, 'The winter is past, the summer is hard by; the tender little flowers are peeping up. He who has begun the good work will perfect it.'"

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE distinguished clergyman whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is well known by reputation to thousands of Christians on both sides the Atlantic. As a preacher, a lecturer and an author Dr. Seiss occupies a position which entitles him to the highest respect. Gifted with oratorical talents of a high order, he has drawn around him, wherever he has labored, congregations who have hung upon his lips with rapt attention, and have been blessed through his instrumentality. The numerous works also which have issued from his pen have been the means of awakening and enlightening innumerable readers in this and other lands.

In deference to the wishes of Dr. Seiss, the narrative of his life which appears here is of a less detailed and personal character than those which are usually published in these pages. There has been nothing of an exciting or unusual character in it; it has been the simple, quiet life of a Christian minister, varied only by change of place and scene, and characterized wherever it has been passed by unintermittent labor of tongue and pen. Such lives, though unmarked by the thrilling events which make up the experience of missionaries to the heathen in foreign lands, and of evangelists who labor among the heathen at home, are eminently useful and necessary to the welfare of the Church and of society. There are many such lives being spent in the Lord's service among us, by men who might in commerce or at the bar or in politics, win wealth and honor, but who are content to spend and be spent for others, satisfied if souls are saved and the Master glorified by their work.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Rev. Joseph Augustus Seiss, D.D., is a native of Maryland. He was born near Graceham, a Moravian town in Frederick County, on March 18th, 1823, and is therefore now sixty years of age. As a boy he was remarkable for his studious disposition and for the ease and rapidity with which he acquired the rudiments of knowledge. Happily for him his early education was confided to the hands of one who was able, not only to teach him secular lore, but to lead his young mind to the source of that true wisdom which could make him wise unto salvation. It was a Moravian pastor at Graceham who first instructed the future orator, preacher and writer and opened up to him the paths of knowledge. When fully prepared for college the young man in 1839 entered Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, where he remained about two years. At the conclusion of his college course he spent a few months in the work of tuition, becoming principal of a select school in Westminster, Md.

ENTERS THE MINISTRY.

But "the Lord had need of him," and God, who selects and prepares the instruments for carrying on His work in the world, made it clear to the young teacher that a life of labor for the Saviour was the path it was his duty to tread. Accordingly he entered into communication with the leaders of his church, and in the year 1842, he being then a young man of nineteen, he became a licentiate of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Virginia. During the following year his duties were of an itinerant character. He visited many towns in Rockingham and Augusta Counties, Virginia, preaching in the churches, visiting the sick, and doing such Christian work as he had opportunity. But it was not to be expected that he would long spend his time in that roving manner. He was gaining experience, his mind was opening by contact with the minds of his older colleagues whom he met and assisted in their labors, and his sermons were awakening attention and doing good.

In 1843 he accepted the pastorate of Martinsburg and Shepherdstown, Va., and labored there with many tokens of blessing for four years. At the end of that time he was led to accept the pastorate of the English Lutheran Church of Cumberland, Md. He was succeeded by a minister with whom he has since been brought into close and intiinate association in many departments of Christian work. That was the Rev. C. P. Krauth, D.D., who by was born on the same night of the same year as Dr. Seiss, studied at the same time at the same college, and was successively pastor of the same four congregations in three States of the Union. They have worked editorially, sometimes together and sometimes in succession; they have often ministered jointly to the same congregation, and have been occasionally at one time in the same pulpit. It is unnecessary to say that they are warm personal friends and cherish a strong fraternal regard for each other. Dr. Krauth became Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy in the University of Pennsylvania in 1868, and was subsequently made its Vice-Provost and Professor of Logic. He took a prominent and active part in the American Committee on the Revision of the Old Testament, which co-operates with the English committee.

During the pastorate of Dr. Seiss at Cumberland he was urged to remove to New York. He was at that time only twenty-six years of age, and the call, which was pressed with some importunity, is an evidence of the popularity and ability of the young preacher. It was, however, declined, and in doing so Dr. Seiss gave evidence of his modesty and his freedom from ambitious aspirations. He continued to labor on quietly at Cumberland, doing much good and winning the love of his people. A second call came to him, unsolicited, from Frederick, Md., but that, too, he declined, preferring to complete the work which he was doing among the people he loved.

In 1852, however, an opportunity for increased usefulness was opened before Dr. Seiss, and certain providential circumstances attending it led him to believe that God was calling him to that sphere of labor. It came from the Second English Lutheran Church of Baltimore, Md., and thither he removed in 1852. There, as at Cumberland, he was encouraged by many tokens of God's blessing. The church prospered in all ways under his ministry, and for six years he continued his labors there.

It was in 1858 that Dr. Seiss commenced his pastorate with which city his name was destined to be ever afterward identified. The call came to him from St. John's Lutheran Church to succeed the Rev. Dr. Mayer, and to the deep regret of his Baltimore congregation, who, like those to whom he had previously ministered, were loath to lose a pastor under whom they had benefited and who became every year, by experience and by study, better able to instruct and edify them. For sixteen years Dr. Seiss continued the pastor of St. John's, and under his ministry the church grew so largely that it was deemed wise, especially as the city became more widely extended, to establish another church. That was done, and when the Church of the Holy Communion was built, Dr. Seiss had to decide to which portion of his people his services would be the more useful, and which portion had the greater claim upon them. He ultimately decided to take charge of the new church, and from 1874 to the present time he has been the pastor of the Church of the Holy Communion in Philadelphia, Such has been the ministerial and pastoral life of Dr. Seiss. It has been one of unostentatious labor, signally blessed of God; and the Christian Church everywhere, but especially his own church prays that it may be long continued, and that in the Providence of God many years of usefulness may be granted to him. He is widely esteemed by his brethren in the ministry, among whom he has the reputation of being one of the most eloquent and earnest pastors of the Lutheran Church. They have recently chosen him as President of the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania, and President of the Board of Directors of the Theological Seminary of Philadelphia.

But Dr. Seiss's reputation and usefulness as a pastor is eclipsed by his fame as AN AUTHOR.

The number of works he has published, the majority of them remarkable for their research and profound learning, would have suggested the inference that their author had no other occupation than that of the pen, and few who did not know, would credit the fact that during the whole time that they have been teeming from the press their author has been one of the most active and zealous preachers and pastors in the country.

It is in this department of labor that Dr. Seiss has become known by reputation to thousands upon thousands of the Christian public in all parts of the world. It may be doubted if any writer in America has done so much as he to elucidate those parts of the Word of God which are dark and enigmatical to the superficial and unlearned reader, but which so abundantly repay earnest and careful study. Dr. Seiss most steadfastly believes that it is the Christian's duty to of the Bible, and he has labored unceasingly to assist those who are desirous of fulfilling that duty. Many a student to whom the books of Daniel, Ezekiel, Zechariah and the Apocalypse were a labyrinth of confusion, grand and majestic in their imagery, but utterly uninstructive and incomprehensible, has been guided into light by Dr. Seiss, who has furnished him with a key which has opened to him a mine of intellectual and spiritual wealth. Those who have had the privilege of listening to his lectures in Philadelphia have been but a small portion of the immense audience whom Dr. Seiss has thus laid under obligation. His published works have had an enormous circulation in this country and a still larger circulation in Europe. Students have gone to them for light; and they have found it.

Dr. Seiss possesses beyond most men the faculty of rendering his ideas realistic alike to hearer and reader. Logical reasoning, brilliant scene-painting and powerful appeals are found in combination in his works. The visions which the Holy Spirit spread before the eyes of God's servants, the prophets, and which under His guidance they wrote for our edification, glow with new light and meaning as Dr. Seiss presents them on his pages. As the great painter Doré comprehended the conceptions of Dante and Milton and Tennyson, and portrayed on canvas the scenes they described, so that the reader whose imagination could not follow their brilliant flight, saw in picture that which he failed to see in all its grandeur in words, so Dr. Seiss in expounding prophecy has given to the events of the future, life and shape and a realism as vivid as the great historian, Macaulay, gave to the events of the past. He has thus taken his readers by the hand, and, leading them through the most wonderful picture-gallery in the literature of the world, painted by the finger of God Himself, has shown them the beauties of those pictures and the lines of thought which make of many isolated scenes one harmonious whole. Dr. Seiss has shown that the God of History is the God of Prophecy, and that the future of the human race is only a continuation of its past, a culmination of the action of potent forces which God holds in His hands, which

The general tenor of prophecies is to the effect that about the period of Christ's approach, there shall be a shaking of all nations and thrones, and of all established governments and apostasies, and extinction of their power and a levelling of all titles and authorities, and this through some great political revolution brought about by the masses of the people. This implies that a democratic and infidel spirit will extensively prevail; for the shaking of the powers of heaven will not so much arise from a conflict of potentates for mastery among each other, as from a breaking forth of the wrath of man against the powers that be; a general casting off of the yoke and cords of restraint, an insurrection of evil doers against their rulers. It is the masses constituting the physical power of the nations, those "mighty waters" which being usually dammed up by political restraints, or, like the sea, having bounds assigned them of the Almighty by a decree, which they cannot pass, though the waves thereof toss themselves and roar, shall now have that restraint removed, and shall overflow and pass over, and like an irresistible torrent sweep down all before it.

Finally it can certainly not be denied by any accurate observer, that the present moral, political and religious condition of the world is altogether without parallel in the past history of mankind. This is indeed universally acknowledged by thinking men as by all leading politicians. And if any further evidence of it were wanting, it is to be found in that indescribable sensation of fear and expectation, which everywhere prevails and fills the minds of men of some mighty event that is coming, but they cannot tell what. The which now arrest the attention of men are a part of the process of judgments preparatory to the demolition of all human rule, authority and power. Hence, the stamp of fatuity and disappointment is, in the present day, evidently put upon every scheme of worldly politicians.

First, Politicians of every party refuse to humble themselves before God, and ask wisdom from Him; therefore are they given up to their own vain imaginations.

Secondly, Their schemes are all for the purpose of upholding or mending, or reforming that which now exists, but is destined to be destroyed, while that which is hereafter to exist by the power of the Son of man, is hidden from their eyes. The stone which is to smite the image on its feet is not yet seen.

But when the despised Jews shall again arise into political existence, and shall stand on their feet in national form, the stone will appear, and break the image of earthly kingdoms in pieces.

But hear our Lord's sign of His own august coming, "For as from the East and shineth unto the West, so shall also be the coming of the Son of man." The light of the natural sun is from East to West. From the East came the Star of Bethlehem. From the East came the wise men. From the East came the Gospel. The fall of Turkey is to prepare the way for the Kings of the East. From the East will come the Angel having the seal of the Living God, and last, to the East do we mainly look for news indicative of impending catastrophe, the preliminaries having already been inaugurated. Hence the allusion to the lightning as shining from East to West, although in fact it gleams in every direction.

The use of the telegraph is not restricted to one direction, any more than the spontaneous element, but is reflex and transverse. Any solution that would apply to one in this respect, would seem to be equally pertinent to the other.

Wonderful indeed have been the recent triumphs of science. In the employment of that messenger of thought, the magnetic telegraph, and submarine cable, the physical world seems almost to have obtruded on the prerogatives of the spiritual world. We feel constrained to hail it as the harbinger of an eventful future. All this God foresaw, who knew the end from the beginning, and if He was pleased to advert to it, a sign of His own august intervention, why then should we not willingly discern a sign so transcendently interesting.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

The Rescue of an Entombed Man from a well after he had been entombed twenty-two hours caused some excitement recently at Dayton, Ohio. The man was digging a well on South Wayne Street, and when he had dug down a considerable depth a large quantity of soil and sand fell upon him. Some timbers happily protected his head, but the soil fell all around him, holding him a prisoner from the shoulders downward. His cries soon brought assistance, and active efforts were made to dig him out. After nearly a foot had been cleared, a rope was attached to his shoulders, and his rescuers tried to raise him by a windlass, but his cries soon caused them to desist. Then there was more digging, and again the windlass was tried, but the man complained that he was being held by the feet, and could not bear the strain. It was then decided to rescue him by digging only, and the party worked all night. In the morning it was found that the timbers had fallen in such a way as to hold the man's feet as firmly as if they were in the stocks, and it was not until the wood was cut away that he could be lifted out. How often have Christian workers had an experience of which this is a type. In spite of prayers and pleadings and appeals an anxious soul has not been raised from darkness into light and peace. Not until it has been found that some cherished secret sin is holding the soul captive and that has been cut away has the soul found liberty (Jer. 5 : 25).

An Earthquake is Predicted to take Place in Utah in the not very remote future. Professor G. K. Gilbert, United States Geologist, published in the Salt Lake Tribune recently a solemn warning that danger exists of a terrible earthquake in the Territory. He writes: "From the Warm Springs to Emigration Cañon fault scarps or earth fractures in the mountains have not been found, and the rational explanation of their absence is that a very long time has elapsed since their last renewal. In this period the earth strain has been slowly increasing, and some day it will overcome the friction, lift the mountains a few feet, and re-enact on a more fearful scale the catastrophe of Owens Valley." The professor's prediction is based on the theory that something beneath each mountain is slowly, steadily and irresistibly rising, and that in yielding to this force the earth's crust is broken. "The motion at the instant of yielding is so swiftly and so abruptly terminated as to constitute a shock." A New York journalist, commenting on the professor's prediction, makes a lugubrious attempt at a witticism in referring to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; but God, who destroyed those cities when their corruption culminated, is the same God whose law the Mormons of Salt Lake City are outraging.

Colonel C. G. Gordon, Better Known as "Chinese Gordon," from his celebrated campaign in China, in which he suppressed the insurrection against the government of that country, has addressed a remarkable letter to the New York Herald on the subject of the proposed Jordan Canal. Colonel Gordon writes from Mount Carmel, where he has been staying for some time during his exploration of Palestine. His letter deals mainly with the natural and financial difficulties of the canal project, but he points out incidentally that if the canal is constructed a notable prophecy will be fulfilled. It is proposed to cut the canal from the Gulf of Akubah, which is an arm of the Red Sea, northward to the Dead Sea and thence to the Sea of Tiberias and the Mediterranean. That would flood the whole Jordan Valley, and would destroy the sites of the places rendered sacred by the Saviour's footsteps, such as Bethsaida, Capernaum, etc. Colonel Gordon refers to the prophecy of Ezekiel (47 : 10) that fishermen will spread their nets at Engedi. Engedi is now so far from fishing waters that it is difficult to understand why fishermen should ever go there, but if the Jordan Canal allowed the waters of the Mediterranean to flow through the valley, the prophecy would be literally fulfilled. Colonel Gordon also refers to the great battle of Armageddon in this connection. He says: "It is remarkable that the plain near Sejem, half way (and to the south) between Haifa and the Jordan Valley is the site of Megeddo, and is generally accepted as the Armageddon of Ezekiel, where the final great battle will be fought against Gog Prince of Rhos, Mashech and Tubal. Now, this word 'Rhos' is put as 'chief' in our Bible. But the Septuagint has Rhus, which is considered the base of the word Russia. And it is remarked by commentators as the only instance of a modern nation being alluded to in the Old Testament. Now, if this canal is made, and if Russia ever did advance, she could not cross the huge inland sea in her advance on Palestine, but would be forced to go to the part between Haifa and Jordan, and then must come down on Armageddon. This is curious when we consider the inevitable advance of Russia on Damascus."

A Chicago Editor's Chagrin, Occasioned by the successive repentance of three members of his family, is described by the Youth's Companion. It states that an editor ordered a pair of trousers from the tailor. On trying them on, they proved to be several inches too long. It being late on Saturday night, the tailor's shop was closed, and the editor took the trousers to his wife, and asked her to cut them off and hem them over. The good lady, who was busy, brusquely refused. The same results followed on application to the wife's sister and the eldest daughter. But, before bed-time, the wife relentingly took the pants, and, cutting off three inches from the legs, hemmed them up nicely and restored them to the closet. Half an hour later, the daughter, taken with compunction for her unfilial conduct, took the pants and cut off three inches, hemmed and replaced them. Finally, the sister-in-law felt the pangs of conscience, and she, too, performed an additional surgical operation on the garment. The next morning the editor felt more annoyed at the results of the ladies' penitence than he had done the night before at their refusals. Tardy repentance does not often lead to results so undesirable. In spiritual matters we are encouraged by our Saviour's parable to believe that God will accept it if it is sincere and accompanied by faith (Matt. 21 : 28-31).

An English Coffin in the Custom House at New York is being held until certain legal questions are decided. It was brought here by a passenger on the steamer France, of the National line, who was in such a precarious condition of health when he left England that it was feared he would die during the voyage. He therefore prepared for this event by purchasing in Liverpool the metallic casket which is at present in dispute. It cost $125. But the passenger did not die during the voyage. On the contrary, he reached New York in greatly improved health. The casket was landed with the rest of his baggage, and the vigilant customs officers sent it to the appraiser's stores, and demanded the payment of duty upon it. Thereupon the owner claimed that it was exempt under the law admitting free of duty "personal property in use." The question to be decided is whether a coffin can be considered personal property in use. The owner, of course, admits that it is not in use now, but asserts that it is intended to be used when the appropriate time comes, and is not for sale. He thinks the custom's officers ought not to fine him for deferring its use as long as possible. The question to be settled is curious, though not of much importance. If the foresight which characterized the gentleman in preparing a protection for his body in case of his death at sea, has also prevented his overlooking the still more important subject of his soul's interests after death, he will not be greatly distressed even if he should have to pay a charge he deems illegal (Luke 12 : 21, 22).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Result of the Election in New York Last week was a mixed one. While the Democrats elected the whole of their State ticket except its head, the Republicans carried the legislature. The disappearance of the phenomenal majority of last year has caused some depression in Democratic quarters. The majority, for the Democratic candidates this year varies, from 12,000 to 15,000. Mr. Maynard, who ran for Secretary of State on the Democratic ticket, was defeated, his Republican opponent being elected by a plurality of more than 19,000. Mr. Maynard's defeat is to be regretted on public grounds; to himself it is honorable. His temperance record arrayed against him the united rum interest of the State, and caused him to be unmercifully scratched. The fact that he ran behind his ticket by about 34,000 votes is significant. It shows the power of the liquor traffic in this State, and proves that not even a man of ability, regularly nominated by a Democratic Convention is safe from scratching when his opponent can denounce him as a total abstainer and a Protestant. In the Legislature the Republicans claim that they will have a majority on a joint vote of about 24. The Senate will stand Republicans, 19; Democrats, 13. The Assembly will stand Republicans, 73; Democrats, 55. In the present Legislature the Democrats have a majority in the Senate of 4, and in the Assembly of 42, giving 46 on joint ballot.

The Result in Other States Affords no Ground to either party on which to base a confident expectation of success next year. In Massachusetts Governor Butler has been defeated by a plurality of more than 10,000. This defeat is not generally deplored in the Democratic camp, as it is regarded as being likely to remove a disturbing element from the next National Convention. In Pennsylvania the Republicans carried the State by about 16,000 majority. Only minor offices were filled there this year. New Jersey has elected a Democratic Governor. Mr. Leon Abbett, who was elected by a plurality of about 7000 votes over his Republican opponent, largely increased his popularity recently by championing in the law courts the cause of a large number of workingmen against a corporation. In Minnesota the Republicans were victorious. The Governor's plurality of about 14,000 votes was, however, a reduction on the figures of the last gubernatorial election two years ago. In Virginia, Senator Mahone has experienced a decisive defeat. The Democrats carried both branches of the Legislature by pluralities variously stated at from 20,000 to 30,000. There was intense excitement during the election, and Senator Mahone was in considerable danger of being killed in a disturbance at Fredericksburg. There was also a fight at Danville, growing out of the election, in which at least seven people were shot. Senator Mahone's defeat in Virginia gratifies some sections of the Republican party, as Governor Butler's defeat in Massachusetts gratifies many Democrats. Connecticut gives a Republican plurality of 5700. Last year the Democratic plurality was 4200. The Republicans claim that they will have in the Legislature a majority in joint ballot of 65. Maryland was carried by the Democrats, who elected the Governor and the Comptroller and Attorney-General. The Democratic ticket, was also victorious in Mississippi. In Nebraska the Republicans claim a majority of over 5000. A Supreme Court judge was elected.

The Cause of Prohibition in Iowa was not, it appears, so triumphant at the polls in October as the figures published indicated. Although the Republicans, who adopted the prohibition plank in their platform, were elected, their pluralities were much smaller than in former elections. The Republican plurality for Garfield in 1880 was 78,000, but this year, although the total vote was larger than in 1880, Governor Sherman's plurality was 25,000. A still more momentous statement is made by the Chicago Tribune, which has canvassed the members-elect of both Houses of the Legislature. It states that there is a clear majority in both branches against the re-submission of the Constitutional Amendment which was carried last year, but was set aside by the Supreme Court on the ground of fatal irregularities in its original passage through the Legislature. In the Senate 27 out of 50 members are said to be against the amendment, and in the House re-submission is favored by less than 40 of the 100 members. It is even doubtful whether the milder form of prohibition by statute, which might be repealed by the next Legislature, will receive a majority in both branches. It was generally understood in other States that a Republican victory this year in Iowa would insure the amendment being again submitted to the popular vote. This announcement by the Tribune is therefore a surprise, and some explanation from Iowa will be in order.

A Modification of the Law Regulating the coinage of silver dollars is urged by Mr. H. M. Burchard, the Director of the Mint, in his annual report published last week. Mr. Burchard reports that under the provisions of the act of 1878, requiring the coinage of $2,000,000 worth of silver builion per month, $154,370,899 had been coined prior to October 1st, and that amount, together with the $81,000,000 of fractional silver in the country, making a grand total of $235,000,000, is, in excess of the requirements for silver circulation. This, he remarks, is apparent from the fact that there are in the vaults of the Treasury 39,000,000 standard silver dollars over and above the outstanding silver certificates, and in addition to nearly $27,000,000 in fractional silver coin—a total of $66,000,000. The director is of the opinion that the law should be modified or repealed. At the beginning of the fiscal year the mints had on hand 35,365,672 standard dollars; the coinage amounted to $28,111,119, and at the close of the year there was remaining in the mints $43,304,590.

Important Changes in the Rules of the Civil Service Reform Act have been made by the President, with the view of making them more efficient and explicit in their operation. A summary of these changes, telegraphed from Washington, states that one change provides that no person while under enlistment in the Army or Navy shall be examined for the Civil Service. Another provides that no person having failed at one examination shall within six months be admitted to another without the consent of the Commission. A third change enlarged the authority of the Commission over technical examinations. A fourth provided that postmasters and collectors should keep the Examining Board informed as to the appointments and promotions at their offices. A fifth change declares that competitive examinations for promotion shall be introduced so far as they may be deemed useful. Another change, which is considered the most important, distinctly prohibits the appointing power—alike in every department and in every post-office and customs office to which the rules extend—from making any discrimination in selections for appointment by reason of any political or religious opinion or affiliation.

A Destructive Tornado Passed over Parts of the State of Missouri on November 6th doing great damage. It struck Springfield about two o'clock in the afternoon, overthrowing the large woollen mills, destroying a portion of the buildings and doing great damage to the machinery. It then passed to the north, demolishing a number of residences. Hazel Dell, a schoolhouse near Springfield, was blown down. There were fifty children in the building, but none of them were seriously hurt. Their escape was miraculous. A telegram from Kansas City, describing the tornado, says: "The path of the storm was only a few yards in width, but wherever it struck the ruin was appalling."

A Remarkable Disaster Occurred at Madison, Wis., on November 8th. The entire roof, together with the inside walls and iron and stone columns of the new south wing of the Capitol fell in, causing the death of four persons and injuring twenty others. The cause of the accident is somewhat uncertain, but the theory generally accepted is that the heavy iron pillars supporting the roof of the second story balcony sank into the plank on which they rested, thus pulling the sound wall outward, which in turn caused the roof of the entire wing to cave in.

The Luther Celebration Commenced in New York and Brooklyn on Saturday last, the four hundredth anniversary of the great reformer's birth. A large meeting was held in the evening in Steinway Hall, at which an eloquent address of two hours' duration was delivered by Dr. Joseph A. Seiss, of Philadelphia, whose portrait appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week. Dr. Seiss described the condition of society at the time when Luther appeared, and the gigantic power and corruption of the Papal Church, and then reviewed in very forcible manner the chief events of Luther's life and work, concluding with an eloquent panegyric on the character of the great reformer. Largely attended meetings were also held in Brooklyn.

Gospel Temperance in Chicago has Received an impetus from the visit of Mr. W. Forbes, of London, whom the Chicago Tribune calls "the Francis Murphy of England." That journal, in describing the first meeting Mr. Forbes held in the Pacific Garden Mission, in Chicago, says: "Mr. Forbes is a very dramatic and sensational speaker, with a good stock of humor and pathos. In his manner and style of speaking he resembles Mr. J. B. Gough. At the close of the meeting an earnest request was tendered to him by those present to speak at the same place the following evening." During Mr. Forbes's stay in Chicago he preached in Mr. Moody's church and other places. Letters for Mr. Forbes may be sent to the Young Men's Christian Association, New York, or to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Shipman, the Gospel Temperance Revivalist from England, commenced a three weeks' mission at Lowell, Mass., on Sunday last. In sending an announcement of the fact, Mrs. Shipman begs that the readers of this journal will pray that God's blessing may continue to rest on her work in this country. The services which she conducted last week at Greenpoint, L. I., were very successful. A large number of persons came forward to publicly confess Christ as the result of the services.

Mr. Philip Phillips, the Singing Pilgrim, has returned to America from Europe. His engagement in Holland, briefly mentioned some time ago in this journal, was, Mr. Phillips informs us, signally blessed of God. The audiences continually increased in number, and much good was done. In one church Mr. Phillips conducted fifty consecutive services, and the interest was sustained throughout. The Gospel hymns he sung were translated into Dutch for the use of the congregations. Mr. Phillips intends to remain for a time in New York to gain a much-needed rest.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

[The paragraphs which usually appear on this page will be found on page 727, under the heading, "The Bible and the Newspaper."]

The Condition of the English Poor Continues to be the most prominent topic in public discussion in that country. Mr. G. W. Smalley cables to his journal that the interest in the question of housing the poor is kept fresh by numerous articles and speeches, the papers in London, Liverpool, and other great cities sending commissioners into squalid districts. Mr. Chamberlain, the leader of the Radical party, will discuss the question in answer to Lord Salisbury. He announces an article on the same question in the next number of the Fortnightly Magazine. His friends say that, far from opposing Lord Salisbury's proposals, he intends greatly to enlarge the scope of the proposed scheme of State interference.

Renewed Disturbances are Reported from Servia, and are causing apprehension in European capitals. It does not appear that the risings are in any instance formidable, but they indicate a prevalent spirit of discontent which is ominous. It is alleged that the disturbances are fomented by Russian intrigue, and that Russia, being anxious to depose King Milan, is stirring up the Radicals in Servia to revolt, in the hope of replacing the king with a ruler who will carry out the Russian scheme of a Panslavist union. The suspicion that Russia is intriguing renders the condition of affairs more serious, as a strained feeling already exists between Austria and Russia, and an untoward event may precipitate the long-expected war between those nations. A telegram received here on November 10th reports that the Servian army has had an engagement with the insurgents, in which the latter were routed with heavy loss.

An Agitation in Jamaica has been Commenced with the view of obtaining relief from British despotic rule. At present the governor of the island is appointed by the British Government, and all officers of the civil service above the lowest grades are sent out from England. In some cases impecunious members of aristocratic families have been appointed to office in Jamaica who are incapable of performing the duties of their offices, and it has been necessary to employ natives of the island to do the whole of the work except drawing the pay. Beside this grievance the citizens complain that they are not adequately represented on the council and have no voice in controlling expenditure and taxation. A deputation waited on the Earl of Derby, the secretary of the colonies in London, on November 8th, and stated their grievances to him. He informed the deputation that the government contemplated making concessions in the direction indicated.

A Fatal Anti-Jewish Riot Occurred near Pesth on November 9th. A cablegram from that city says a mob attacked the Jews at Zalaloevoe. The police, who were called upon to protect the Jews, were fired on by the mob. They returned the fire, killing two and wounding several of the rioters, and the remainder fled. Three of the men who participated in the riot were arrested, and have turned informers.

The Customary Lord Mayor's Procession and banquet took place in London on November 9th. It appears that the new Lord Mayor, Alderman Fowler, was not popular in London, and that the election, which in that city is by the corporation and not, as with us, directly by the people, was opposed by the liverymen of the city. The opposition was so decided that the Lord Mayor was hissed as he went through the streets with his procession to take the oath of office. Startling placards were posted on the blank walls calling on "the unemployed workpeople of London to organize huge meetings to denounce the civic revellers who feast while thousands of men, women and children are starved to death." The London correspondent of the New York Herald reports that one of the posters contained these ominous words: "Many who partake of this night's feast have fattened and grown rich out of the rents of the filthy slums which disgrace this city. Worse housed than the beasts of the field, starving and wretched, our poverty dealt with as a crime, numbers of our class have been done to death within workhouses and prison walls." The American minister did not attend the banquet, and it is stated that he was not invited. If that is true the invidious slight indicates a very strange disposition on the part of the new Lord Mayor.

The Withdrawal of British Troops from Egypt is expected to take place speedily. Mr. Gladstone, speaking at the Lord Mayor's banquet on November 9th, intimated that the withdrawal was finally decided. The announcement was received with expressions of disapprobation. It is now reported that Sir Evelyn Wood, commander of the British troops in Egypt, explicitly and emphatically denies that he has at any time advised the withdrawal of British troops from that country. On the contrary, he is fully convinced that there are many good reasons why they should remain.

The Subject of Marine Insurance will Probably claim the attention of the British Parliament at its next session. Mr. Chamberlain, the President of the Board of Trade, has awakened to a perception of the fact that wrecks of vessels heavily insured are increasing in number. The figures for 1883 are largely in excess of those of 1882. There is good reason for believing that many ships are insured and sent to sea in cold blood with the intention that they shall founder, and that the owners make a profit by the loss of the ships with the lives of those on board, the policy of insurance being of more value than ship and cargo. A bill has been framed by Mr. Chamberlain to prevent shipowners profiting by a wreck. Humanity demands that it should become law.

The German Crown Prince has Arranged to pay a visit to the King of Spain. It is expected that the prince will travel by rail to Genoa, from which port he will be escorted by three German men-of-war to Spain. The Emperor of Germany has informed the Spanish Government that he would be pleased to return King Alfonso's visit in person were it not for his advanced age. Great festivities and military parades will be held during the visit of the Crown Prince, who will stay in Madrid one week. The visit has created a great sensation in Berlin. Misgivings are freely indulged in that France will regard it with irritation.

A Colossal Bronze Statue of Luther was unveiled on November 10th at Eisleben, in Germany, in which town Luther was born four centuries ago. Fifty thousand spectators assembled to witness the ceremony. The correspondent of the New York Herald describes the scene as most impressive and symbolical of the solemnity, force and earnestness of the German people. "Every house in Eisleben is literally covered with evergreen wreaths, festoons, miniature flags, Chinese lanterns and crystal reflectors, giving the place the appearance of a forest of Christmas trees bearing, as fruit, the portraits of Luther, Kaiser Wilhelm, the Kronprinz, Bismarck and Von Moltke. The streets are strewn with evergreen branches." The ancient town, said to have been in existence more than nine centuries, contains two houses which are pointed out respectively as the places in which Luther was born and in which he died. A picturesque procession, attired in ancient garments, accompanied the officials who conducted the ceremonies of the inauguration of the statue.

An American Tourist in a French Lunatic asylum. An American named Heine arrived in Paris about three weeks ago. Leaving his hotel in the Rue du Croissant, he wandered aimlessly about for some time, and having no knowledge of French, was unable to make himself understood or to inquire his way back to his hotel. Becoming somewhat excited in his endeavor to obtain the necessary information, he was finally arrested as a lunatic, and taken to the Sainte Anne Asylum, where, after several days' search, he was found by his friends.

ABIJAH, OR SOME GOOD THING TOWARD THE LORD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And all Israel shall mourn for him, and bury him: for he only of Jeroboam shall come to the grave, because in him there is found some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel in the house of Jeroboam."—1 KINGS 14 : 13.

God's Instruments of Discipline—The Rod before the Axe—The Disguised Queen—Good News Unappreciated—The Character of the Prince—His Bible Name—I. The Good Thing not Defined—A Good, Substantial Virtue—Its Entrance Unknown—Its Direction—Attracted Love—Was within Him—II. The Good Thing Apt to be Overlooked—Grace that Grows and Breeds—Grace in a Child—A Good Thing in a Bad House—A Ragged Boy in an Irish Church—III. The Good Thing Not Understood—A Godly Child in an Ungodly Family—Good People Distributed—Often Die Young—A Sailor Reproved by a Child in New York—A Swearer Moved by his Child's Sorrow.

JEROBOAM had proved false to the Lord who had placed him upon the throne of Israel, and the time was come for his overthrow. The Lord, who usually brings forth the rod before He lifts the axe, sent sickness into his house: his son Abijah was sore sick. Then the parents bethought them of an old prophet of God, and desired to know through him what would happen to the child. Fearful lest the prophet should denounce plagues upon him and his child if he knew that the inquirer was the wife of Jeroboam, the king begged the Egyptian princess whom he had married to disguise herself as a farmer's wife, and so get from the man of God a more favorable answer. Poor foolish king, to imagine that a prophet who could see into futurity could not also see through any disguise with which his queen might surround herself! So anxious was the mother to know the fate of her son, that she left his sick-chamber to go to Shiloh to hear

THE SENTENCE OF THE PROPHET.

Vain was her clever disguise! the blind prophet was still a seer, and not only discerned her before she entered the house, but saw the future of her family. She came full of superstition to be told her fortune, but she went away heavy, having been told her faults and her doom.

In the terrible tidings which the prophet Ahijah delivered to this wife of Jeroboam, there was only one bright spot, only one word of solace; and I am greatly afraid that it gave no kind of comfort to the heathen queen. Her child was mercifully appointed to die, for in him there was "found some good thing toward Jehovah, God of Israel." As an Egyptian, it is not likely that she appreciated the meaning of that sentence; probably she thought it of very small importance that her child should have regard toward the God of his people. She saw not the light which was full of joy.

In what an unhappy condition is that person who cannot derive comfort from the salvation of his own child! Yet there are many men and women in such a state. They care nothing for the souls of their own offspring. It would bring no joy to them if they saw all their children walking in the truth; nor does it cause them any concern to see them otherwise. To see them sharp in business, or fair in countenance, is their main ambition; but to have them beloved of the Lord is no matter of desire. Poor souls, their own carnality overflows and saturates their family! To some it would even cause anger and wrath to see their children turning to the Lord; they so despise true religion that, if their sons and daughters were converted, they would rather hate them than love them the more. Such persons make curses out of their blessings. They put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter, darkness for light and light for darkness; and therefore that which ought to be their comfort and joy becomes a source of disquietude.

But, beloved, I think I could say of the most of us here present, that if we did but know of a surety that there was in our child some good thing toward Jehovah, God of Israel, we would be perfectly content to leave all the rest of his case at the absolute disposal of the Lord. If such a child should die, it would be well; for it is much better to have a child in heaven than to have one on earth breaking our heart by his wicked ways; and if such a child shall live, what happy prospects open up before us, that as his years advance, he will grow in knowledge, and in favor both with God and man! We will bless the Lord let Him send what He will to our children, so long as He has chosen them to be His own, and has put His fear in their hearts. This wretched wife of Jeroboam went her way in utter misery; for that sentence which would have been a sweet solace to us, had little or no charm for her. Oh, the sinfulness of that heart which finds no comfort in the salvation of the soul of a dying child!

This morning we are going to look into the little that we know of the young prince Abijah. We know nothing more of him than the text tells us. His name was a suitable one. A good name may belong to a very bad man; but in this case a gracious name was worthily worn. He called God his Father, and his name signifies that fact. "Ab," you know, is the word for "Father," and "Jah" is "Jehovah"—Jehovah was his father. I would not have mentioned the name had not his life made it true. Oh, you who bear good Bible names, see that you do not dishonor them!

I. I shall ask you first of all to follow me in studying the character of this prince while I say, let us here admire what we cannot precisely describe. And I mean, first, by that, that there was in this child "some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel;" but

WHAT WAS IT?

Who shall define it? A boundless field for conjecture opens before us. We know there was in him some good thing, but what form that good think took we do not know. Tradition has made assertions, but as these are mere inventions to fill up a gap, they are scarcely worth mentioning here. Our own reflections will, probably, be as near the mark as these improbable traditions. Perhaps the obscurity was intentional. We may learn much from the silence of Scripture; we are not told precisely what the good thing was, because any good thing toward the Lord is a sufficient sign of grace. Where there is some good thing toward the Lord God, every good thing is present in seed and essence. The "some good thing" which is so fully developed as to be seen and noted is an index of the presence of all the rest, since the grace of God is not divided, but is present as a whole. God's blessings come in groups; and if some good thing be apparent, all others which are really vital and essential are there. We do not know exactly the form it took, but there it was: "some good thing" was in the child's heart toward Jehovah, God of Israel.

Carefully note that it was not merely a good inclination which was in him, nor a good desire, but a really GOOD, SUBSTANTIAL VIRTUE.

There was in him a true and substantial existence of grace, and this is far more than a transient desire. What child is there that has not at some time or other, if it has been trained in the fear of God, felt tremblings of heart and desires toward God? Such goodness is as common as the early dew; but alas! it passeth away quite as speedily. The young Abijah possessed something within him sufficiently real and substantial to be called a "good thing;" the Spirit of God had wrought a sure work upon him, and left within him a priceless jewel of grace. Let us admire this good thing, though we cannot precisely describe it.

Let us admire, also, that this "some good thing" should have been in the child's heart, for its entrance is unknown. We cannot tell how grace entered the palace of Tirzah and gained this youthful heart. God saw the good thing, for He sees the least good thing in any of us, since He has a quick eye to perceive anything that looks toward Himself. But how did this gracious work come to the child? We are not told, and this silence is a lesson to us. It is not essential to us to know how a child receives grace. We need not be painfully anxious to know when, or where, or how a child is converted; it may even be impossible to tell, for the work may have been so gradual that day and hour cannot be known. Even those who are converted in riper years cannot all describe their conversion in detail, much less can we expect to map out the experience of children who have never gone into outward sin, but under the restraints of godly education have kept the commandments from their youth up, like the young man in the Gospel narrative. How came this child to have this good thing in his heart? So far we know; we are sure that God placed it there; but by what means? Thy footsteps are not always seen, O God of grace, but we have learned to adore Thee in thy work, even when we discern not thy way.

This "good thing" is described to us in the text in a certain measure. It was a "good thing toward Jehovah, the God of Israel." The good thing looked toward the living God. In children there often will be found good things toward their parents; let these be cultivated—but these are not sufficient evidences of grace. In children there will sometimes be found good things toward amiability and moral excellence; let all good things be commended and fostered, but they are not sure fruits of grace. It is toward God that the good thing must be that saves the soul. If a man be travelling away from God every step he takes increases his distance from Him; but if his face be toward the Lord he may be only capable of a child's tottering step, but yet he is moving nearer and nearer every moment. There was some good thing in this child toward God, and that is the most distinguishing mark of a truly good thing.

In this dear child that "good thing" wrought such an outward character that he became exceedingly well beloved. We are sure of that, because it is said, "All Israel shall mourn for him." He was probably the heir to his father's crown, and there were godly but grieved hearts in Israel that hoped to see times of reform when that youth should come to the throne; and perhaps even those who did not care about religion, yet somehow had marked the youth, and observed his going in and out before them, and had said, "He is Israel's hope; there will be better days when that boy becomes a man;" so that when Abijah died he alone of all his race received both tears and a tomb; and was buried with respect, whereas all the rest of Jeroboam's house were devoured of dogs and vultures.

HE DIED LAMENTED,

It is a very blessed thing when there is such a good thing in our children that they come to be beloved in their little spheres. They have not all the range which this young prince enjoyed so as to secure universal admiration; but still the grace of God in a child is a very lovely thing, and it draws forth general approbation. I do not know how it is with you, but youthful piety is a very touching thing to me; I see the grace of God in men and women with much thankfulness, but I cannot perceive it in children without shedding tears of delight. Once again, let us admire what we cannot precisely describe; for I have not ventured upon any precise description, but I have closely followed the words of the text.

The piety of this young child was every way of the right kind. It was inward and sincere, for the "good thing" that is spoken of was not found about him, but "in him." And this is the kind of thing which we desire for every one of our friends, a work of grace within. The grand point is not to wear the garb, nor use the brogue of religion, but to possess the life of God within, and feel and think as Jesus would have done because of that inner life. Small is the value of external religion unless it be the outcome of a life within. True grace is not as a garment, to be put on and taken off; but it is an integral part of the person who possesses it. This child's piety was of the true, personal, inward kind; may all our children have some good thing in them!

II. Now, changing the line of our thought a little, I come to a second remark: in this case let us heartily prize what we are TOO APT TO OVERLOOK.

First, let us heartily prize "some good thing" toward the Lord God of Israel whenever we perceive it. All that is said of this case was that there was in him "some good thing;" and this reads as if the divine work was as yet only a spark of grace, the beginning of spiritual life. There was nothing very striking in him, or it would have been more definitely mentioned. Inasmuch as we read that in him was "some good thing," it is implied that it was not a perfect thing, and that it was not attended with all the good things one might wish for. Many good things were missing, but "some good thing" was manifest, and therefore the child was accepted and by divine love rescued from an ignoble death.

Do you not think that there is a tendency with many Christian people when they are talking with inquirers to look for every good thing in them, instead of looking for some good thing in them? Here is a person professing to be converted; he is evidently sincere and honest, and therefore he is very cautious not to say more than he feels, and this makes him say little, and that little tremblingly. You put him a question which everybody ought to be able to answer; but this nervous one fails to answer it, and therefore by a severe judgment it is thought that he is ignorant and unenlightened. Cold prudence decrees that a person who cannot answer such a question cannot be a child of God, and little allowance is made for timidity and flutter of mind.

I fear that in many a case harshness has wrought serious mischief to those who were with all their hearts coming to Jesus. That harshness may have been thought to be fidelity by him who exercised it, and perhaps it was; but there is such a thing as mistaken fidelity, and faithfulness is not the only virtue needed by a soul-winner. I would not have you err, brethren and sisters beloved, when you are talking with seekers by whispering in their ears, "Peace, peace when there is no peace;" but on the other hand I would not have you sin against the child by a hard, suspicious manner, and by demanding more of a youthful heart than the Lord Jesus would have looked for.

Further, I am afraid we are too apt to overlook "some good thing" in a child.

"OH, ONLY A CHILD!"

Pray, what are you? You are a man; well, I suppose that a man is a child who has grown older, and has lost many of his best points of character. A child is at no disadvantage in the things of God from being a child, for "of such are the kingdom of heaven." Men have to grow back into children before they enter the kingdom at all. If there be some good thing, it ought not to be doubted and thought to be questionable because it is in a child; for in Holy Scripture it is very common to find good things in children.

Another thing we are apt to overlook, and that is, "some good thing" in a bad house. This was the most wonderful thing of all, that there should be a gracious child in Jeroboam's palace. The mother usually sways the house, but the queen was a princess of Egypt and an idolater. A father has great influence, but in this case Jeroboam sinned and made Israel to sin. It strikes me as a wonder, that he should make Israel to sin but could not make his child to sin. All the land feels the pestilent influence of Jeroboam, and yet close at his feet there is a bright spot which sovereign grace has kept from the plague; his first-born child, who naturally would imitate his father, is the very reverse of him—there is found in Jeroboam's heir "some good thing toward Jehovah, God of Israel." In such a place we do not look for grace, and are apt to pass it by. Never despise the most ragged child.

A clergyman in Ireland, ministering to a little Protestant congregation, noticed for several Sundays, standing in the aisle near the door,

A VERY RAGGED BOY,

who listened to the sermon most eagerly. He wished to know who the boy could be, but he always vanished as soon as the sermon was over. He asked a friend or two to watch, but somehow the boy always escaped, and could not be discovered. It came to pass one Sunday that the minister preached a sermon from this text, "His own right hand and his holy arm hath gotten him the victory," and after that time he missed the boy altogether. Six weeks elapsed, and the child did not come any more, but a man appeared from the hills, and begged the minister to come and see his boy, who was dying. He lived in a miserable hovel up in the mountains. A six-mile walk in the rain, through bogs and over hills, and the minister came to the door of the hut. As he entered, the poor lad was sitting up in bed, and as soon as he caught sight of the preacher he waved his arm and cried out "His own right hand and his holy arm hath gotten him the victory." That was his closing speech on earth, his dying shout of triumph. Who knows but in many and many a case the Lord's right hand and holy arm have gotten Him the victory, despite the poverty and the sin and the ignorance that may have surrounded the young convert? Let us not therefore despise grace wherever it is, but heartily prize what we are apt to overlook!

III. Lastly, let us carefully consider what we cannot fully understand. I want you first to consider the very singular fact which you cannot understand, that holy children should be often placed

IN UNGODLY FAMILIES.

God's providence has arranged it so, yet the consequences are painful to the young believer. You would think that if God loved a child He would not suffer it to be born unto Jeroboam's court, and that He would not send His own chosen down into a back slum to be surrounded by everything that will grieve its tender heart; and yet God does send His dear children into such places. Why is this?

Well, first they are God's protest against sin where no other protest would be heard—a tender touching message from God to let the ungodly know that there is something better than the sin in which they wallow. Holy children are as angels amid demons, by their innocence rebuking sin. Does not God send children there also to make a display of His divine grace, that we may see that He chooses whom He wills and takes one of a family according to His good pleasure? Does He not also show us that He can keep grace alive in the most unlikely places where all things war against the soul? The grace of God can live where you and I would die. The life of grace can continue under conditions which threaten death.

Is it not remarkable how

as we scatter salt? He sets one of them down in each den of evil. Saul the king is a great rebel against God; but close at his side is Jonathan: thus the sweetest flower that ever bloomed is found growing near the roughest bramble that could be found. What a sty of filthiness was the court of Ahab! and yet he had for his chamberlain Obadiah, who hid the servants of God by fifties in a cave, and fed them from Jezebel's table; Nebuchadnezzar must not be left without three holy champions who can go into the fire for God. Look at Belshazzar drinking wine out of the cups of the sanctuary, and yet a Daniel is employed in his court. Even in the court of Ahasuerus, Esther is placed to confront that wicked Haman. Oh, I think there is never an Uz without a Job, nor a Chaldea without an Abraham, nor a Sodom without a Lot, nor an Egypt without a Moses, nor a house of Eli that has gone astray without some little Samuel sent of God to bear His protest. Think over the ways of God to man and admire what you cannot understand.

The next thing that we cannot understand is this, that God's dear little children who love Him should often be called to suffer. We say, "Well, if it was my child I should heal him and ease his sufferings at once." Yet the Almighty Father allows His dear ones to be afflicted. The godly child of Jeroboam lies sick, and yet his wicked father is not sick, and his mother is not sick; we could almost wish they were, that they might do the less evil. Only one godly one is in the family, and he lies sick! Why was it so? Why is it so in other cases? You shall see a gracious child a cripple, you shall see a heavenly-minded girl a consumptive; you shall often see the heavy hand of God resting where His eternal love has fixed its choice. There is a meaning in all this, and we know somewhat of it; and if we knew nothing we would believe all the same in the goodness of the Lord.

There is something more remarkable still, and that is that some of God's dearest children should die while they are yet young. I should have said let Jeroboam die and his wife too, but spare the child. Ay, but the child must go; he is the fittest. His departure was intended to give glory to God's grace in saving such a child, and making him so soon perfect. It was to be the reward of grace, for the child was taken from the evil to come; he was to die in peace and be buried, whereas the rest of the family would be slain with the sword and given to the jackals and the vultures to tear in pieces. In this child's case his early death was a proof of grace. If any say that converted children ought not to be taken into the Church, I answer, how is it the Lord takes so many of them into heaven? If they are fit for the one, they surely are fit for the other? It is wonderful what great grace may dwell in a boy's heart; child piety is by no means of an inferior kind, it is sometimes ripe for heaven.

A SAILOR LANDED IN NEW YORK

one day, and he said to himself, "I'll have a fine time of it before I go to sea again." It was Sunday morning, and in the madness of his wickedness he went up to a girl who was going to her class, and he spoke to her mocking and wicked words. She turned round and looked at him with her beautiful, sad eyes, and said, "Sir, you will have to meet me at the bar of God!" The sailor started back, turned on his heel, and made the best of his way to his vessel that he might get out of temptation. He said afterward, "I never had such a broadside in my life as that girl gave me; she raked me fore and aft, and swept by the board every sail and spar with which I had got ready for a wicked cruise." He went on his knees, repented of his sins, and found the Saviour.

A SWEARING FATHER.

A father was swearing dreadfully one day; he had often been rebuked for it but never felt the rebuke; but on that occasion using a most horrible expression to his wife, his little daughter in fright ran behind the door and began to cry. She sobbed aloud until her father heard her. He said to her, "What are you crying for?" "Please, father," she said, and kept on crying. He cried out roughly, "I will know what you are crying about;" and the child replied, "Dear father, I was crying because I am so afraid you will go to hell, for teacher says that swearers must go there." "There," said the man, "dry your eyes, child—I will never swear any more." He kept his word, and soon he went to see where his daughter had learned her holy lesson.

Now, if children living among the roughest can by their tears win the victory, your dear child, with whose curls you used to play, but who has now been taken home to heaven, ought to touch your heart if you are not following in the way to glory! Your child beckons you from above, and bids you "come up hither." Will you turn away? There is but one way; it is by faith in Jesus that men are saved. May Christ the Lord lead you to it now if you are unconverted, and may there this day be found in you "some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel." Amen.

MISS S. SEED,

Missionary in China.

ON the next page is a portrait of a lady who sailed for China on October 24th last, under the auspices of the China Inland Mission, to labor among the benighted inhabitants of "The Celestial Empire." The circumstances attending her conversion and her consecration to this self-denying work are remarkable. Miss McLatchie, the distinguished Scottish evangelist, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 21st, 1882, was conducting special services some months ago in the town in which Miss Seed resided. The simple, powerful Gospel message went to the hearer's heart, and the Holy Spirit blessed it. But she resisted the good influence, and that she might not be further troubled by conviction she went on a visit to a town some miles off, so that she might not be tempted to go to another of the services. But in spite of that step she could not resist going, and returned the next day in time to hear another sermon. Again she heard words that seemed specially meant for her. The subject was, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" and every word hit her hard, and to keep herself from utterly breaking down she recalled to mind all the hard and unjust actions and inconsistencies—as she thought then—of professing Christians; her heart hardened, and all desire for better things went from her.

The next time Miss Seed attended an evangelistic service in the same place, she heard the same attractive and impressive preacher. The subject on this occasion was, "Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" and she was then led to look away from others, and see how the matter stood between herself and God. The last address she heard from Miss McLatchie at this time was from the words, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock," and God's love was brought before her so vividly that her own ingratitude seemed black indeed. She was humbled and abased to the very dust, and did not dare to think of approaching God until she had done something to make herself presentable to Him. So resolving to set to work to do something, she knew not what, she was about to leave the meeting, and got half-way down the chapel, when her attention was arrested by the words, "There is no to-morrow in the Bible. Jesus says, 'Come to Me to-night—just now—all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest;' and He also says, 'If any man open, I will come in.' Come to Him just as you are, and there is free and full forgiveness for all your past sins; sinner! meet the Saviour to-night." Miss Seed stayed to the end of the service, and was led that very night to give herself to the Saviour.

Of her subsequent emotions and experiences, Miss Seed writes: "It seemed to me now the least I could do was to give myself entirely to the Lord to work for Him, and tell out to others what a Saviour I had found; and that night my prayer was, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' And the answer came, as with an audible voice, 'Go work in My vineyard.' I asked then for work to be given me. I remembered that when our Lord gave His directions to His apostles to preach to all the world, they were to begin at Jerusalem, and it seemed plain to me I ought to begin at home, where I was known. A class was vacant in one of the Sunday-schools, and I volunteered my services, which were accepted. I was also led to start a Bible-class for young women one evening a week. Then it was made clear to me, my whole time ought to be devoted to the Lord's work; and again I asked for work to be given me, and work was given me—that of preaching the Gospel as an evangelist.

"A great desire took hold of me very soon after my conversion to work among the heathen, especially among the Chinese, and that I made a matter of special prayer to be guided and fitted for the work; and I do indeed now rejoice that the work God gave me to do at home has given me experience that will be useful to me in China, whither He has called me to go and work for Him. He has led me on step by step; I see now so clearly His hand in it all.

"For God's honor and glory, be it said, He has used me in a marvellous way in winning souls to Him, and now He has called me to a foreign field of service, to tell out to the poor heathen Chinese that this Saviour is for them and all the world."

Miss Seed is accompanied by another lady missionary, also bound for China, and sent out by that useful and meritorious society, the China Inland Mission.

AN ENCOUNTER WITH A CAPE BUFFALO.

THE missionaries who go out to preach the Gospel of Christ to the heathen are shining examples of the influence Christianity exerts in annihilating the natural love of self and regard for self-preservation. Every man who goes out knows that in the work to which he has given himself he will encounter dangers innumerable. In many cases he has to expect the hostility of those he seeks to benefit; in nearly all cases he is exposed to the effects of a climate fatal to the white man, and in not a few instances he is in peril from wild beasts. The last-mentioned danger is most prevalent in Africa, and the records of missionary life in the Dark Continent are full of incidents in which valuable lives have been placed in imminent peril from that cause. One such incident is depicted in the illustration on this page.

It appears that a missionary, being desirous of penetrating from Cape Colony into the interior, took advantage of the departure of a hunting expedition to obtain by accompanying it protection and company for some fifty miles of his journey. It was his habit to ride forward with the hunters every day, leaving his carriers to follow with such small baggage as he needed, and they travelled with the servants of the expedition, and were instructed as to their route and a rendezvous at a native village.

One morning near the end of the journey a herd of buffaloes was sighted. The Cape buffalo is a dangerous beast, having a hide that ordinary balls will not penetrate except at short range. The horns are strong and curve outward and upward, enabling the animal to gore to death not only horses but even tigers and lions. The missionary had no care for sport, though he was armed with a musket for his protection in such emergencies. He halted while his companions went forward in chase. He watched them speed away until they were mere specks in the distance, while the herd of buffaloes, with tails erect, went madly careering away on his left. As he watched them retreating he became conscious of some heavy body approaching. Looking around he saw that a buffalo had been separated from the herd and had been wounded. But its wound, though bleeding freely, appeared to have excited rather than subdued its fury, and it was rushing toward him with mad frenzy. He had but a moment's warning, but in that moment he wheeled his horse quickly, barely escaping the horns of the beast. He knew that the buffalo would speedily return to the charge when it recovered itself after missing the horse. Quick as thought he levelled his musket, and before it could stop and turn again upon him he fired. The beast received the ball when scarcely ten paces from the muzzle of the musket, and rolled over dead. It was a narrow escape, and the saved man offered thanks to God for His marvellous interposition.

The Cause of the Defeat in Ohio of the Sec ond or Prohibition Amendment was thus eloquently explained on November 2d, in the course of a speech at Lutherville, Md., by Mr. George A. Hilton, who was one of the most prominent workers for the amendment in the campaign: "If in the late contest in Ohio, principle instead of selfish policy had prompted the heretofore dominant party of that State, the success of the Second or Prohibition Amendment would have been assured beyond all question. And if in spite of all opposing elements the truth prevailed to-day, there remains but little doubt, in the light of glaring frauds already known to have been perpetrated, that 'prohibition of intoxicating liquors' was really carried by a majority of not less than twenty thousand votes. Woe be unto them upon whom rests the dreadful responsibility of setting at defiance the wishes of a determined people, supported by a law that reaches far beyond, and punishes with a surer judgment than the enactments of all human codes. A day of reckoning is at hand, and the private sentiment that impelled at least three hundred and seventy-five thousand citizens of Ohio to solemnly protest at the polls against the body and soul-blighting influences of a degrading and infamous traffic, will supply the public sentiment that in the very near future will redeem that great State from the grasp of weak and policy-truckling politicians."

THE WATCH BY FREDDY'S CRADLE.

IT was only a laborer's child. The doctor came and looked at it as it lay in its little bed breathing heavily, with now and again a momentary pause as if the tide of life was halting on the threshold. It was scarlet fever, he said; "there is a great deal of it about, and this seems to be a bad case. 'Dangerous?' Yes, it was dangerous." And then, seeing the mother's eyes fill with tears, he said, "but it may recover, we can never tell how these cases will turn out." He had many other patients to see that morning, and this was not nearly so important as those in the brown-stone houses. So he gave a few verbal directions, wrote a prescription, pocketed his dollar and a half—the doctor was always particular about that when attending a case in a laborer's cottage—and then went his way.

What a breaking heart he left behind him! Mary Vernon flung herself on her knees beside the little cradle in which lay her precious first-born, and wept as if her head was a fountain of tears. It seemed so little to that doctor, but to her it was as if the aspect of the whole world would change for her if that little life should be blotted out. The blow was too sudden and too dreadful to be borne easily, and she knelt there almost dazed with grief.

Presently the quick, vigorous step of a man sounded without. Mary started; it was her husband come home to his dinner. She had forgotten all about it, but it did not matter; her terrible news quoted from the doctor would prevent Charles Vernon eating the best dinner that could be set before him. Little Freddy was the joy of the strong man's life, and if he died the two would sorrow together.

"Well, Mary," he said, speaking softly as he entered, "what does the doctor say? Why, how you've been crying! You don't mean that there is any danger?"

Then Mary told him, and he sat down, and, throwing his head on his hands, he shed the first tears that had fallen from his eyes in ten years. At last he rose, and looking down into the cradle with unutterable tenderness, he said, "Poor little fellow! Maybe it isn't true, Mary. Those doctors are not always right. We won't give up hope yet." Then he went to the drug-store and had the prescription made up, and having taken the medicine to his wife, went back to his work too sick at heart to eat the little dinner his wife had placed ready for him.

Mary resumed her watch over the child. He lay as if asleep, but she did not think he was really sleeping. It seemed more like insensibility. As she watched, her fancy played those tricks upon her that affectionate nurses are familiar with. She thought his face was getting paler; then she fancied the pauses in the breathing were longer and more frequent, until in her alarm she was near running out into the street and calling some one in to stay with her. Gradually she became calmer and her thoughts grew busy. She resolved as the result of her meditation to have some talk with Charles when he came home.

"As the mother watched, her thoughts were busy."

"Charley," she said, when she had answered his question about Freddy's state, "do you think God is going to take Freddy away to punish us? Seems to me that we have not done right since we were married. I used to pray every night and morning when I was a girl, but I have got out of the way of it now."

"So have I, Mary. It was not right, for we've had a happy home. I have had regular work, and though we are poor as things go, we have not wanted for anything. We ought to have thanked God for it. Especially since Freddy was born we ought to have looked to that. To-day when you told me what the doctor said, I felt like praying to have the child spared, and I felt too mean to do it. It seemed as if I only went to God when I wanted something. What do you say, shall we ask a clergyman to come in and say a prayer for the boy?"

"I don't think that is the right way," said the wife. "I think we ought to pray ourselves if it is to do any good. What the clergyman would say would not put us right. Seems to me that perhaps God is reminding us that we cannot get along without Him, and He is going to take Freddy away to teach us never to forget Him again. If Freddy dies I shall always want to go to heaven more than ever, so as to see him again."

This conversation was carried on in whispers as the two sat one on each side of the cradle where the child lay unconscious as he had lain all day. They both looked sadly at the little sufferer, and sorrow and remorse filled their hearts as they thought of this cherished treasure God had given them, and for which they had never even thanked Him. Both were conscious of their faults, for with both of them the removal of the restraints of a godly home, which their marriage and removal to another State had brought about, had been accompanied by a decadence of religious life. Charles had thought a walk with his pretty young wife on the Sunday morning and a pipe at home in the evening a pleasanter way of spending the day than the way he had been used to spend it as a boy at his father's house. As for Mary, she liked what Charley liked, and so they had scarcely been inside a church since they were married, and she, like Charley, had given up private prayer. Now, like Joseph's brethren in Egypt, they remembered their faults, and recognized in their bitter sorrow the retributive hand of God.

"If I had done wrong at the works," said Charles, after a long silence, "and I knew I had done wrong, I know well enough what I should do. I should go right up to the boss and own up whether I got bounced or not. I should not sulk. I feel like that about poor Freddy. I'm for telling God we are sorry, and we feel we have done wrong, and asking Him to forgive us. What say you, Mary?"

Mary thought so too, and they both knelt down, and in no formal way, but with all his heart in it, Charles Vernon confessed that he had forgotten God and that he was sorry for it. He pleaded for forgiveness, but he said nothing about the boy whose life hung in the balance. His ideas of honor would not let him ask God for a favor then, but Mary could not let the matter end so. As Charley said "Amen" her spirit rose, and she cried earnestly, "O dear Lord, do let our child live," to which Charles added "Amen." They both rose relieved, and returned to the cradle. There was no change there; but they did not expect one as the result of their prayer. But still they both felt more hopeful than before. All night long they watched, and before Charles went to his work in the morning he knelt again and offered a short prayer.

It was about an hour afterward that Mary, still on her knees by the side of the cradle, detected a change in the child's breathing. It became less rapid and more natural, and putting her hand on the brow so hot and dry last night, she detected a slight perspiration. She knew the crisis had passed, and with tears of joy in her eyes she offered her thanks to God.

Presently the doctor came again, and this time spoke hopefully, and said the medicine was doing wonders. Mary did not know, but she thought perhaps the change was not altogether due to the medicine. When Charles hurried in at dinner time, not knowing but that he might find his treasure dead, he heard the good news with a bounding heart. Freddy gradually recovered, and every step in his progress was marked by renewed consecration on the part of his father and mother. The neighbors praised the doctor's skill, but Mary and her husband have always believed that God in His mercy raised their child from the brink of the grave when He saw that His chastisement had fulfilled its mission. And they did not, when the danger was past, forget the vows they had made in the darkness of the shadow of death.

POVERTY'S PREY.

A SERIAL STORY.

To Prison Again.

DAVY stood in a dark corner over against the house, watching its inmates pass to and fro. There was old Euclid going in with his empty basket; it was quite empty; so he must have had a good day. And presently he saw the glimmer of a candle in the garret-window. What would Victoria say when she saw him and his prison-crop for the first time? He was almost as much afraid of her and Euclid as he was of Blackett. Could he make them believe that he had only been in jail for begging? Surely they would not be too hard on him for that! Yet he felt the old glow of shame again at the thought of going out to beg.

His mother would believe it, and know it to be true. He was longing for the sight of her; but he dare not go past Blackett's open door. The tears smarted under his eyelids as he thought of how soon now he was going to see her. Then a dark dread crossed his mind. He had been away for three months; and suppose his mother should be dead! Oh, if that could be! Dead and buried, and he never to see her again!

At length Blackett came out, and staggered up the street toward the enticing spirit-vaults at the corner. Now was the moment. He crept cautiously to the entrance, and then darted through the lighted passage almost at a bound. In an instant his hand was on the latch; and, flinging open his mother's door, he rushed in, panting, and closed it after him, as if fearful of being pursued. He could hardly see for a moment, though there was a candle in the room. But, when he looked round, there was his mother lying on the bare sacking of her miserable bed, her face pale as death, and her sunken eyes, with a famished, ravenous expression in them, fastened eagerly on him. They told a tale of terrible suffering. It seemed to David as if he had almost forgotten his mother's face while he had been in jail, and that now he saw it afresh, with all the story of her pain and anguish printed upon it. He stood motionless, staring at her; and she lifted herself up on the bed, and held out her arms to him.

"O Davy, my boy! Davy!" she cried, "come to me! come quickly!"

With a deep groan, such as is rarely wrung from the lips of a man, the boy flung himself into his mother's arms; and the mother bore the shock of agony it caused her without a cry.

This was her son, her firstborn. He was the baby who had first lain in her bosom, now so tortured with ceaseless pain, and who had filled her whole heart with love and joy. She could recollect how his father had looked down upon them both with mingled pride and shyness. She almost forgot her pain in the rapture of fondling him once again. Her shrivelled, wasted hand, whose fingers were drawn up with long years of toil, stroked his poor head, with its prison-crop of hair, where the baby's flaxen curls had grown; and her lips were pressed again and again to his face. She could not let him go.

"I was doin' nothin' but beggin' for you, mother," he sobbed out at last.

"I know, Davy; I know," she said, sinking back exhausted, but still holding fast his hand, and devouring him with her eyes. "It couldn't be no sin, God in heaven knows. You'll make a good man yet, in spite of all, like your father, Davy. You're as like him as like can be!"

She lay looking at him with a smile on her face. So much care had been taken of him in the jail, that he looked more like a man, or at least gave more promise of growing into a strong, capable man like his father, than he had ever done while he starved on scanty fare at home. His face, too, had lost its boyish carelessness, and wore an air of thought, almost of gloom, such as sat on most men's faces.

"Maybe I ought to ha' gone into the house," she said, as her eyes caught sight of David's short, dark hair. "It's bad for folks to say you ever went a-beggin', and was took up for it. But I never knew nobody go into the house as I should like to be with, or have Bess be with. Most of the folks as have gone out of our street 'ud shame the bad place itself; and it 'ud be worse than dyin' to live among 'em all day, and all night, too. I always said, and I promised father when he was dyin', I swore a oath to him, as long as I could stand at a tub, I'd never mix myself up with such a lot, or let his boy and girl go among 'em. But maybe I ought to ha' given in, instead of lettin' you go a-beggin'," she added, with a profound sigh.

"No, no, mother; don't you fret about me," answered David. "Why! I've learned a trade in—there," he said, avoiding the name "jail." "And I know how to work now, and I'll keep you and Bess. Sometimes I used to think, s'pose they'd only taught me outside, without goin' inside that place! I'd have learned it with more heart, and never got the bad name as folks will give me now. I can mend boots and shoes prime now; and I can read and write almost like a scholar. But I shall never get over being in there!"

"Oh, you will, you will, my lad!" cried his mother faintly and sadly.

"No, I can't never forget it," he said, with a look of shame and sorrow on his face. "Father's name was always good, and mine never can be. Mother, if they'd only tried to find out if I spoke true! But they didn't take no time or trouble. I didn't know where I was afore the magistrate said, 'Three months!' And they bundled me away as if I weren't worth taking trouble about. I'm a jail-bird now."

"No, no!" sobbed his mother.

"That's what the neighbors'll call me," he went on. "And Blackett'll crow over me. They'll never believe I was only beggin.' I feel as if I couldn't hold my head up to face them or Bess. Where's Bess, mother?"

But, as he spoke, Bess came in, and, with a cry of delight, ran to him, and flung her arms round his neck. He could not rid himself of those clinging arms; and he burst into a passion of weeping as Bess kissed him again and again.

"They were wicked, cruel people as sent you to jail, Davy," she repeated over and over again, "cruel and wicked! cruel and wicked!"

It was some minutes before they could speak to one another in any other words, or before Bess remembered on what errand she had been absent when David came home.

"They can't let us have the ring this evening, mother," she said after a while. "Mr. Quirk's away till this time to-morrow; and Mrs. Quirk says as she daren't part with any o' the rings without him."

"What ring?" asked David.

"Mother's ring," answered Bess.

"We were forced to part with it, Davy," said his mother in a pleading tone, as if to justify herself to him. "I'd clemmed myself till I could bear it no longer, and every think else was gone. It was the last time I set foot out o' doors. I carried it myself to Mr. Quirk's, and swore as I'd redeem it. And Bess there has earned money to redeem it; and we thought we'd get it back to-night. But you're come back instead, my lad; and I can bear to go without the ring."

His mother's wedding-ring had been all his life to him a sacred thing, the only sacred thing he knew of. It was blended with all his earliest childish thoughts of his dead father, whom he had never known, but of whom his mother talked so often of an evening when work was done, and she wore the ring, and when the glimmer of it in the dim firelight made it visible, though almost all else was in darkness. All the inherent superstition and reverence for sacred symbols common to our nature centred for David in his mother's wedding-ring. He knew what straits of gnawing hunger Bess and his mother must have undergone before they would part with it; and his bitterness and heaviness of heart—for he had left jail in bitterness and heaviness of heart—were increased tenfold by this loss of her ring.

"We'll have it to-morrow," he said in a stern and passionate voice.

Yet they were on the whole happy that evening; it was so much to be together again. Bess had plenty to tell of her daily tramps through the streets, and David talked of his plans for the future; while their mother listened to them, thankful beyond all words to have her boy in her sight once more. Even during the night, when she heard him turning uneasily to and fro on the scanty heap of straw they had managed to get for him to lie on, so hard to him after his comfortable hammock and warm rug in the jail, her heart felt lighter than it had done for many months. Her poverty continued, her sore pain was not less agonizing; but David was at home again, and life was once more dear to her.

Bess was up as usual in the morning; and David would have gone with her, but for Euclid. He shrank from meeting any of the neighbors; and, if it had been possible, he would have remained indoors till his hair had grown long again. All the day he stayed in the dark, unwholesome room, talking at times with his mother, but generally sitting silent, with his head resting on his hands. The hours seemed endless. Hunger and cold he had borne with courage, and he could do so still; but shame he could not bear. Pride in a good name was the only moral lesson he had been taught; and his good name was gone. His mother had sympathy enough to guess what troubled him; but she did not know how to comfort him. There was a vague, indistinct feeling in their minds that he had not forfeited his good name; he had been robbed of it.

At last evening came, and Bess went out again to redeem the precious pledge. Both David and his mother forgot their troubles for a brief space of time as they thought of seeing it shine once more on her hand, so wasted and shrivelled now, and so different from the firm young hand that had first worn it. It had been a brand-new ring when David Fell bought it—no other would satisfy the proud young artisan—a thick, heavy ring of gold, such as the finest lady in the land might wear.

"It's here, mother!" cried Bess, running in almost breathless, with the small, precious packet in her hand. David lighted the candle, and held it beside his mother, as her trembling fingers unfolded the paper in which it was wrapped. But what was this? A thin, battered ring, worn almost to a thread. No more like the one they all knew so well, than this bare and desolate room was like the pleasant house David Fell had provided for his young wife. Mrs. Fell uttered a bitter cry of disappointment.

"O Davy!" she cried, "it isn't mine! it isn't mine!"

In two minutes from that fatal cry of despair, David, panting, bareheaded, nearly mad with passion, stood on the pavement in front of the pawn-shop. There was no need to enter it; for Mr. Quirk was pacing to and fro in front of his premises, inviting the passer-by to inspect his goods. He was a short, undersized, knavish-looking man. David confronted him with a white face and dilating nostrils, holding out the ring to him.

"It isn't mother's!" he gasped. "You've give Bess somebody else's ring. This ain't mother's ring."

"That's Mary Fell's ring," drawled Mr. Quirk sneeringly, and as coolly as if he had prepared himself for the charge, "as she pledged here to me two months ago. That's her ring."

"Give me my mother's own ring!" shouted David, every nerve and muscle tingling with all the force and energy he had in him. "Give me her ring, you swindling thief!"

"It's Mary Fell's ring," repeated the pawnbroker stubbonly; "and Mary Fell's well known as a thief and a drunkard, and something worse."

Scarcely had the words against his mother's good name been pronounced, before David had flung himself in his rage, and the unusual vigor he had brought from jail, upon the puny man, who was unprepared for the attack. The boy and the man were not ill matched, and blow after blow was given. The battered old ring fell to the pavement, and was trodden under their feet. A circle of spectators gathered as if by magic about them in an instant, none of whom cared to interrupt the sport such a contest afforded. There were cries and cheers of encouragement on all hands, until the combatants fell, David uppermost.

"What's all this about?" inquired a policeman, elbowing his way through the crowd, and calmly looking on for a minute, while David still struck hard at his enemy, who was struggling up to his feet. The policeman seized the lad by the collar, and he tried to shake off his hold as he faced the pawnbroker blind and deaf with rage.

"Give me my mother's ring!" he shouted.

"I give him in charge," said Mr. Quirk, welcoming the policeman's interference; while David felt an awful thrill of despair run through him as he saw whose hand was grasping him. "I was a-doin' nothing, and he up and at me like a tiger," added the pawnbroker.

"Ay, he did; I saw him," cried a woman standing at the pawn-shop door. "He's a young jail-bird; everybody can see that."

It was only too plainly to be seen. David was now standing perfectly still in the policeman's grip, pale and frightened, with a hang-dog air, which told powerfully against him. One of the passers-by, an intelligent, well-dressed mechanic, pressed forward a little, asking, "Why did you meddle with the man?

What's this about a ring?" But the policeman checked David's attempts to reply.

"That's no business of mine," he said sharply. "You give this lad in charge?"

He addressed himself to Mr. Quirk, who replied plaintively:

"I'm a householder and a rate-payer," he said, "and I give him in charge."

"Then you'll make your defence before the court," said the policeman to David. "Come along with you!"

David glanced round the cluster of faces hemming him in. Some of them he knew. Blackett was there, grinning triumphantly, and Roger was peeping behind him, half afraid of being caught by his father. Euclid had stopped for a moment, with his basket on his arm, and was looking on with an amazed and puzzled face. David dared not call upon any of them by name; but he cried out, in a lamentable voice, which touched and startled many of the careless onlookers:

"Will somebody tell my mother what's befell me?"

He saw Roger make him a sign that he had heard and would fulfil his request, before he was marched off to the police-station to pass a night there—no longer a strange and unprecedented occurrence to David.

DAVID AND GOLIATH.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 25, 1 Sam. 17: 38-51. Golden Text, ver. 47. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Israel's National Trouble—Confronting Armies—The Champion's Challenge—His Insolence—The Stalwart King in Fear—God's Order of Battle Forgotten—Saul not the Only Resource—David's Arrival in Camp—Snubbed by his Brother—Summoned to the King—His Confidence in God's Power—His Invulnerable Armor—The Fall of the Philistine.

THE key-note of our subject for to-day is the verse chosen for our golden text, "All this assembly shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the Lord's, and He will give you into our hands." Saul had grievously failed, by taking the direction into his own hands, and he was now the rejected of God. David had been anointed king, but was in no way acknowledged as such, and was living a life of obscurity. True, he had been for a time at court, but he was now again the keeper of his father's sheep.

Troubles had risen upon the political horizon of Israel, for the Philistines gathered together their armies to battle, and Saul and the men of Israel were gathered against them; the contending armies having each taken up a position on a mountain side with a valley between them. Hostilities had not yet commenced on either side. But a man of almost unprecedented height and strength came forth out of the Philistine camp and challenged the camp of Israel to find on their side with whom he would settle the matter in single combat. The height of this man, Goliath of Gath, could not have been much under ten feet, and the weight of his armor was something astounding, over 2 cwt.; the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam; and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron, i.e., 25 lbs.

This man sought to intimidate the hosts of Israel. He stood in full sight of the Israelitish army, in all the strength of his giant proportions, and cried out to them, probably in a voice which accorded with his commanding appearance, "Why are ye come out to set your battle in array? Am not I a Philistine, and ye servants to Saul? choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me. If he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants; but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us." How came it that this man addressed himself to the people and not to Saul? how is it there was no recognition of his authority as king? The appearance, the court, the state were all there, but of real power there was none, and his very enemies seemed to feel it. The giant called upon the people, and not upon the king, to choose their defender. Seeing that his challenge was met with consternation and silence, the Philistine grew bolder, and defied the armies of Israel. Saul was the one man whose physique was most adapted to the encounter, but no such thought possessed him. The king, whom the children of Israel had desired to go before them and fight their battles (1 Sam. 8: 20) was now and all Israel with him.

"DISMAYED AND GREATLY AFRAID,"

Where were the promises of the living God? where was His command that when they went to battle against their enemies, and saw horses and chariots, and a people more than they, they should not be afraid of them, "for the Lord thy God is with thee?" Had they failed to observe the order of battle commanded in Deut. 20: 2-4: "And it shall be, when ye are come nigh unto the battle, that the priest shall approach and speak unto the people, and shall say unto them, Hear, O Israel, ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies; let not your hearts faint, fear not, and do not tremble, neither be ye terrified because of them: for the Lord your God is He that goeth with you, to fight for you against your enemies, to save you." Had Samuel not been deposed, he would, no doubt, have encouraged the people according to God's command; but Saul, from whom the Spirit of the Lord was departed, could only discourage them.

Israel's defence, however, did not depend on reprobate Saul;

GOD HAD OTHER RESOURCES.

It was only after the challenge of the Philistine had been repeated forty days or nearly six weeks that David came upon the scene. Three of the sons of Jesse were soldiers in Saul's army, and David, no longer needed at court in the time of war, was quite content to go back to his old humble occupation. Jesse was anxious to get news from the front, and sent David rather than his other four sons, to go and bring him back tidings. David was not loath to go, and he arose early, and left the sheep with a keeper, not with his brethren, to do his father's bidding. He arrived just as the armies were about to begin the conflict, and shouted for the battle.

But once again before blood was shed, Goliath made a last challenge to the Israelites. David heard it; it was the talk of the camp, and he asked eagerly, "What shall be done to the man that killeth this Philistine, and taketh away the reproach from Israel? for who is this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should defy the armies of the living God?" By Saul and the people it was regarded as a political matter, but David saw the cause of God and His honor to be at stake, and God's cause was David's cause. Eliab, David's eldest brother, in common with all the men of Israel, fled from the giant, and was sore afraid of him, and now that he saw a purpose and a courage in his brother David, which put him to shame, he was mortified. Instead, however, of owning his own fault and his brother's superiority, he attempted to calumniate him by ascribing to him the worst of motives, "Why camest thou down hither? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle." David's dignified and unanswerable answer was, "What have I now done?

IS THERE NOT A CAUSE?"

But David did not push himself forward. It was Saul who sent for him, and then David said to the king, "Let no man's heart fail because of him; thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine. And Saul said to David, Thou are not able." Measuring the frail, ruddy youth with the herculean strength of the Philistine giant, the odds seemed immense against David. And is it not thus in many of our lives? our difficulties of natural disposition, our circumstances, the characters of those around us are more than we can grapple with, we are not able. But the young shepherd had had experiences of which the king knew nothing, the Lord was with him, and he had been enabled to conquer in the conflict with the strongest beasts of the forest, had snatched a lamb of the flock from the mouth of a lion, and from the mouth of a bear, and slain them, and on this ground he said, with the certainty of one who trusts in God, "The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine." Yes, God was able; God's ability was to be matched against the Philistine the Almighty against the giant.

David did not see himself in the struggle, he stood altogether on one side as a spectator; the Lord would do it. Dear reader, is it thus with you? When any difficulty presents itself do you look to your resources or to God's? Is your life so really the Lord's that you can claim that all which concerns you concerns Him, too, and thus make your battle to be the Lord's? Is it the Lord who is to deal with that husband, or wife, or child of yours? Is it the Lord who is to undertake in that inextricable business of yours, which will involve many besides yourself? Is it the Lord who undertakes that long-standing sickness of yours? Are these things quite out of your hands and into His, and is He able? Can He do it? Then how can it fail? "Saul said to David, Go, and the Lord be with thee." But the king thought the Lord was not to be trusted without some little help, and so armed David with his armor; but David soon divested himself of all this: "I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them:" he had proved God, and was ready to go with Him.

To human eyes unarmed, taking with him only five smooth stones from the brook, David went forth to meet the Philistine. But in reality he was better armed than the giant,

AN INVULNERABLE ARMOR,

even the wings of the Almighty, were about him, and God Himself was his shield. The Philistine looked about for some worthy opponent, and disdained David; he wanted to show forth his own prowess, and to conquer this stripling he thought hardly worth while, so he cursed David, and promised that he should soon be the food of the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field. Then David said, "Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield: but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand; . . . that all the earth may know that

THERE IS A GOD IN ISRAEL.

And all this assembly shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the Lord's, and He will give you into our hands." Reader, had you been in David's place would you have had no misgivings? would you not have thought better to be not quite so positive? David was sure of his ground, because he dealt with God.

It did not take God long to slay the Philistine; a simple stone directed by the hand of God sunk in the giant's forehead, and he fell upon his face to the earth; then David cut off his head with his own sword. But all was not yet over: the youth had promised the Philistines that not he only, but all the host of the Philistines, should be a prey to the birds and beasts. God had all in hand; terror took possession of the Philistines when they saw their champion was dead, and new courage revived in the hearts of the children of Israel when they saw that God, through David, was fighting for them. The Philistines were routed, slain and spoiled, and David returned to Saul with the head of the giant in his hand; victory was complete, the Lord had conquered, not by sword or spear, but through one of the weak things of this world. Let us make common cause with God, trust Him with the fighting of our battles, and then the victory will be no doubtful one.

The Christian Herald for 1884.

THE editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a few words to say on behalf of the publishers, to the friends of the paper That is not an uncommon occurrence, as every week, with undeviating regularity, the two parties are brought into friendly, and as there is substantial reason to believe, profitable communication. But this week a subject is dwelt upon which is very seldom referred to in these columns. That subject is the journal itself.

First. There is an agreeable duty to perform. The circulation THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has attained during the comparatively short time it has been published in this country, is unparalleled in the history of religious journalism. That fact is remarkable, because the paper has been so little advertised and the army of canvassers it is generally thought necessary to the prosperity of a weekly journal to employ, has not been employed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Yet the readers of the paper have continued increasing in number year by year. The present circulation is therefore almost wholly due to the kind efforts of voluntary canvassers, who have introduced the paper to their friends. The sincere thanks of the publishers are due to them, and are hereby tendered.

Second. The friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be pleased to learn that God is using the paper in the work of converting souls and in strengthening, encouraging, and comforting His people. It is the conviction that the paper is being thus used, that has induced its friends to work in order to extend its influence. The year now drawing to a close has been in this way the most remarkable in the history of the paper. The hearts of all engaged on the paper have been gladdened by reading testimonies from every State of the Union, of the good it has been the means of doing. For these results the publishers claim no merit. They are, however, humbly thankful to God who has given to their efforts His blessing, without which the best efforts would have failed.

Third. It is possible that much more good may be done in the coming year. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as heretofore, will rely chiefly upon the efforts of its friends everywhere to extend its circulation. It depends upon them whether the growth of its subscription list shall continue and increase in regular progression. If every subscriber could secure one other subscriber—which would not be a difficult undertaking—the list would, of course, be doubled at once. But more than that might be done. It is not necessary to canvass; it is only necessary to show any number of the paper, and to say that it is a fair specimen of the other numbers. Those, too, who desire to do so, can have a bundle of back numbers for distribution by sending a postal card to the Manager; and a statement of terms will be sent to any one who will act as agent in his own locality.

Fourth. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue—God willing—in the future, the same work, on the same lines, as in the past. If it is possible by divine help to make it brighter, more interesting, and more useful than it has been, neither labor nor expense will be spared in the attempt, but there is no intention to abandon the general plan which God has blessed. It is intended that, as heretofore, every number shall contain:

I. The portrait and biography of some eminent person.

II. A verbatim report of the sermon Dr. Talmage preached on the Sunday morning immediately preceding the day on which the paper is issued.

III. An article expounding some portion of the prophecies of the Word of God.

IV. A series of short anecdotes and incidents furnished by evangelists and Christian workers in all parts of the world.

V. A new sermon by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, the eminent London preacher, which by a special arrangement with his publishers is sent in proof sheets to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the day before it is published in England.

VI. Pictures illustrating scenes of foreign missionary work, or passing events, or stories of a directly evangelistic influence.

VII. An exposition of the International Sunday-School lesson, written by Mrs. M. Baxter, for the assistance of teachers.

VIII. An instalment of a serial story free from sensationalism and distinctly religious in its tendency.

IX. A summary of the events of the week, viewed from a Christian point of view, giving information as to public matters of general interest and advocating general social and political reforms, and individual abstinence from intoxicating liquors.

This is a list of the chief and prominent features of each number, and, though there are generally other features, those above mentioned are never omitted. A journal adhering without deviation to that programme, and with no denominational bias, every Christian pastor may recommend to his congregation with confidence, and every Christian worker may usefully recommend to his friends. If those subscribers who have assisted in circulating THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the past will continue their efforts, and those who have hitherto neglected to introduce it, will now commence to show it and recommend it, and if all who read it will pray that God will bless it, the year 1884 will be a year of extended usefulness for the paper and the good it has been enabled to do in the past will be only the first fruits of an abundant harvest.

Below are a few extracts from a large number of letters containing similar testimonies, which have been recently received from subscribers in various States who bear witness of the good work the paper is doing in their respective localities.

Dr. Talmage writes: "I congratulate the Christian Herald on its widening field. The paper is full of compressed information, and bears evidence of having an especial mission. Mr. Fernie has proved his rare qualifications for this sphere of editorial work, and has displayed a unique faculty for spiritualizing ordinary events, which otherwise might pass without any significance."

The Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., writes: "For several years I have been a reader of the Christian Herald, and have enjoyed it. No man of sense critically approves all departments of any newspaper, whether edited by himself or another, but, with this abatement, I can cordially recommend the Christian Herald as bright, instructive, interesting, and trustworthy. It is remarkable for being timely. It does not give old news, nor uncertain news, nor useless news, nor wicked news, but much news that is interesting and instructive. Every week I send my copy away, sometimes to distant parts of the earth, believing it will do good."

The Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., of Boston, Mass., writes: "It would give me great pleasure to distribute copies of the Christian Herald in my congregation. I will call especial attention to them. I value the paper very highly, and am constantly recommending it."

From Australia. M. John Esler, of Stewart's Camp, Riverena Plains, N. S. W. Australia, writes: "I am a regular reader of your widely-circulated paper, which I get from New York by mail. I spend many happy hours in the loneliness of the Australian Bush reading its valuable pages. I should like to express my gratitude to its editor and to the writers whose articles it publishes. God grant the Christian Herald a still wider circulation, and bless it still more in the salvation of souls."

From China. The Rev J. N. Hayes, of Shanghai, China, in renewing his subscriptions, writes: "We enjoy your most excellent papers in our China home."

AN interesting and useful work has recently been published by a Christian officer in the British army, recounting particulars of his life in India and of the efforts he made to serve Christ among the soldiers. The book is entitled "Reminiscences of Life in Mysore, South Africa, and Burmah." The following extracts from it, accompanied by a portrait of the author, which appears on the first page, cannot fail to be read with interest.

General Dobbs was born about the year 1807, in Dublin, of a good family, and, from the age of twelve, was well instructed in the Bible, and often impressed for a time by the preaching of the late Rev. Hugh M'Neile (afterward Dean of Ripon), at that period carrying on his beneficent ministrations with true evangelical fervor in Dublin. These early impressions, however, soon passed away, and from the age of sixteen to nineteen, young Dobbs threw himself into the gaieties of Dublin, and especially of the theatre.

CONVERSION ON BOARD SHIP.

Having entered the army, and received his commission, Mr. Dobbs embarked for India at the end of June, 1827, full of military ambition, and with romantic views of pleasurable enjoyment in that wonderful land. He had seen more of "gay life" than his brother officers who sailed with him, and was considered unusually wild. Nothing of any consequence occurred till July 30th, when, while pacing the quarter-deck with an officer named Patterson, three years older than himself, they commenced talking about religion and their past lives. Patterson remarked that he had no fear of the future, for, though he had committed many sins, he had been very charitable, and God would forgive his sins on account of his good deeds. The following colloquy followed, as narrated by General Dobbs himself: "I said, 'Let us not add to our sins by mocking God in talking of our goodness; our sins can be pardoned only through Christ, and we must be converted by the Holy Spirit, and entirely change our lives, if we would be saved.' He replied, 'That is rank fanaticism. You might as well say that we ought to throw ourselves into the sea.' I rejoined, 'Have you ever read the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican? I feel myself to be a Publican.'"

While thus speaking, an overwhelming sense of his sins, as committed against a loving Saviour, rushed into his soul. He hastened to his cabin, and spent that night in an agony of prayer. The fear of hell he never felt, but only the heart-breaking sense of sinning against Him who had died for him. Again and again that night he repeated the same words, "O Lord, Thou knowest how often I resolved to give up my sins, and follow Thee; but all in vain. I now form no resolves, I make no attempt to save myself; but throw myself at Thy feet to receive Thy free grace." Ere the sun rose next morning, he received, by the mighty power of the Holy Spirit, the full assurance of pardoning love, and his soul was filled with joy.

COMMENCES WORK FOR CHRIST.

The very next day he avowed the change he had experienced, and exhorted his fellow-passengers to come to Jesus. There was one young officer, Charles M'Kenzie, who had been brought up under the cold shade of moderate Presbyterianism, who read his Bible daily, and repeated a prayer; but, having lived in a retired place in the Highlands, had never heard of, much less understood, the nature of spiritual religion, and during the past month on board ship, had nearly, if not altogether, cast off his educational religion. The change in the gayest man on board, who, with patronizing kindness, was initiating him into the knowledge of the world's pleasures, came on this youth (he was only sixteen) as a miracle. He began at once to read the Bible with Mr. Dobbs, and one morning said, "I cannot explain—in fact, I do not understand—the change which has come over me." He had no intellectual knowledge of the work of the Spirit, who was working in him mightily, through the first spiritual words ever addressed to him. M'Kenzie soon found rest in Christ, and lived a consistent, Christian life in India for twenty years, till sickness compelled him to retire, and go to Australia, where he died many years ago.

UNFURLING HIS COLORS IN MADRAS.

Mr. Dobbs arrived in Madras in January, 1828, with an ardent desire to make known the love of Jesus to his brother officers. During his short stay in the cadets' quarters, one cadet was brought to a knowledge of Christ, who died, a few months later, happy in the Lord. A few days after his arrival, Mr. Dobbs was appointed to do duty with the 16th Native Infantry, in Vellore, and the party of cadets for that and some other stations marched from Madras under the command of a lieutenant of some standing. The youthful convert was soon called on to show his colors, for, with only one or two exceptions, the party consisted of thoughtless youths, whose profane conversation was encouraged rather than checked by the commanding officer. Cadet Dobbs was enabled, however, to put a stop to such conversation at mess, by threatening to report the lieutenant to the Adjutant-General, if he did not put a stop to language which was opposed to the Articles of War.

From this period commenced a life devoted to Christ, and characterized by intense fervor in winning others in the narrow way which leads to eternal life. His devotion to military duty secured him the unqualified respect of his superior officers, and his progress was comparatively rapid. We shall now, however, let General Dobbs speak for himself. He says:

"In 1834 a chief commissioner, and four superintendents (or commissioners) were appointed for the government of the whole country of Mysore, which was divided into four districts or provinces, with an aggregate area of about 30,000 square miles.

"Over one of these districts called Chittledroog, wth an area of about 6000 square miles, as a young British officer, I was placed, and was invested with undivided power in every department, with only a few general rules to guide me, but with the advantage of not only being authorized to apply officially for instructions whenever I thought necessary, but also to correspond freely with the experienced chief commissioner of Mysore.

"Our first march was to Cuddub, a large town twenty miles from my headquarters. I, of course, rode, but my wife travelled in a palanquin. All along the road I was greeted at each town and village with arches of flowers placed across the road, and a procession of the villagers, among whom prominently walked the temple dancing girls, which was considered a special mark of distinction. This practice I had much difficulty in stopping, as the people could not enter into my objections. These women, though called the wives of the gods, were brought up by the Brahmin priests to a life of immorality. (See Frontispiece.)

"On getting up the next morning, I observed the light shining through the walls of our sleeping tent, and found that both the outer and inner walls had been cut through during the night, and my writing-desk, which was lying open on my table, was gone. On going outside, I found the desk open as I had left it the previous evening, and not a single article missing, not even the rupees which it contained. Though I was a very light sleeper, the thief had passed under our bed to the table, and though there was no light in the tent, carried off the desk without awakening us. From my subsequent knowledge, I believe the thieves had got alarmed at the thought of robbing the chief magistrate.

"From Cuddub we marched to Chicknaikenhulli, a large and prosperous town, where we encamped under a splendid Banyan tree (sufficiently large to shelter a regiment); it was subsequently blown down in a storm.

THE PRINCIPAL HINDU FEAST.

"The Dessarah, or principal Hindu feast, was held at this time, and I received all the principal inhabitants sitting on a chair at my tent door. While thus engaged, a large troop of little Brahmin girls (many of them betrothed or married, as marked by their dress) walked in a circle round me several times, and presented me with flowers. While pondering on this unusual and extraordinary honor shown me by the daughters of the principal inhabitants, some of these fascinating and really beautiful children, asked me to give money to the feast. The object of the parents was now evident—a bold attempt to obtain my countenance to their idolatrous festival. (See frontispiece.) It was really a trying moment to me; my heart said, How can you resist their sweet innocent smiles? oh, it is only giving a few rupees to little girls. I, however, realized by God's grace that this affair was pregnant with importance, His own honor and glory being at stake. I might in a moment of weakness compromise my character, not only as a Christian, but as a Christian ruler; but while acting with decision, I then, as ever afterward, treated the natives with consideration. Not being sufficiently acquainted at that time with the vernacular language (Canarese) to explain myself on a difficult subject, I directed one of my interpreters to explain that while I could not in any way identify myself with their religion, neither would I interfere with it; that my religion forbade me countenancing any religion I did not approve of. They, of course, expressed themselves satisfied, and apologized for the forwardness of the little girls. Never afterward was any similar honor shown to me.

A RISING OF REBELS SUPPRESSED.

"In 1849, a tumultuous uprising of thousands of adherents of the Polligars took place near Chittledroog. Being pressed by the Chittledroog police, they crossed the frontier into the Nuggar Division. On Sunday morning my magistrate munshi came early to report that no intelligence had arrived during the night, and to apply for orders. I replied I had none to give; but shortly after he left me, and while I was praying to God for guidance, the conviction flashed across my mind that the marauders would be met by the Nuggar police, that they would recross the border, and take up a position on certain hills a few miles from Holalkerry (one hundred miles from Toomkoor, where I was). So strong was my conviction, that I at once sent for the munshi and sent an express to the native officer commanding the irregular cavalry stationed in the Chittledroog fort, directing him to proceed without delay to the hills indicated, where he probably would find the Polligars. The express reached this officer late at night; he lost no time, and accompanied by Lieut. Harkness, an officer attached to the companies which had come from Hurryhur, started before daylight.

"After a march of twenty-five miles, they reached Holalkerry about noon the following day, and were there informed by two detectives that the rioters had taken up a position on the hills referred to. The native officer proposed that men and horses should have a little rest, and get some refreshment before proceeding further. 'No,' replied young Harkness, 'let us not delay one moment, the enemy will get word of our approach, and escape.' They accordingly pressed on (see frontispiece), and completely surprised the insurgents. One-half of the men dismounted, and, led by Harkness, ascended the hill and captured all the Polligars and their followers, who made but feeble resistance. Thus, through the prompt measures taken, the activity of the police, and energy of this valiant young officer, the rising was suppressed without a single village being plundered, or a drop of blood shed.

A BRAVE LIEUTENANT CONVERTED.

"The sequel to this narrative will interest all who value religion above the most important affairs of this present world. Shortly after the circumstances narrated, official duty called me to Davenghery, a large town, eight miles distant from Hurryhur, where an old Hyderabad friend commanded. I had not seen Colonel Justice for many years, and was glad to have this opportunity to visit him.

"Justice was now, like myself, a married man, and said, 'You must spend Sunday with us.' I replied I would be most happy, but expected to be the chaplain for the day, and that, as he knew, while using the Episcopal Service, I always preached extempore. He expressed his cordial acquiescence with my proposal, and accordingly I joined him on Saturday evening.

"The next day, both at morning and evening service, all the Christian community, with the exception of two sick officers, assembled in the mess-house (see frontispiece); among them was Lieut. Harkness, who had never once since his arrival in India, seven years previously, attended any place of worship. I preached in the morning on the text: 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian,' and God's Holy Spirit brought home conviction to the heart of the above-mentioned officer, who yielded himself to Christ, and having lived a consistent Christian life for thirty years, died as a major-general two years ago. Another officer, named Palmer, was deeply impressed, and was subsequently led to a full reception of salvation through Christ by the instrumentality of a Captain Colbeck. This officer (Palmer) died early in life, and, as I was assured, in perfect peace.

CHOLERA IN CAMP.

"I will now speak of my experience in connection with cholera. The 9th Regt., N. I., in 1837-38, when marching from Cannanore to Bellary, was attacked by cholera before entering the Chittledroog Division.

"On Major Woodward reporting the first two cases to the colonel, the latter in alarm and anger, declared he would put any man under arrest who dared to say there was cholera in camp. The major said no more, but fearlessly did his best to arrest the progress of the disease, which, however, increased daily as they marched onward, till on their arrival in my Division there were from fifty to seventy deaths daily.

"On hearing that great difficulty was experienced in procuring supplies and coolies to carry the sick, I considered it my duty to proceed to the camp and afford all possible assistance. I accordingly sent out my tent, and wrote to Lieut. Lawford, the only officer personally known to me, and invited him to bring all officers so disposed to breakfast with me. Several accepted the invitation, among them a powerful young man, upward of six feet high. I observed this officer, Lieut. H., call Lawford aside, and speak to him in a low voice. The latter then informed me that H. wished to confess his awful wickedness, which grieved him very greatly, in having for the last three years made from worldly motives, and now, being afraid of death, hoped his richly-deserved torments in hell might be lessened by his confessing his sin.

"We hoped after such a confession that he would truly repent, but though the fear of death brought torment, it brought no change of heart or life. On the cholera disappearing, Lieut. H. entered on a reckless career, which ended in his being obliged to leave the army. I heard nothing of his subsequent history.

GREAT MORTALITY AMONG THE NATIVES.

"Seventy deaths occurred on the first day I visited the camp; and as the difficulty of obtaining coolies and supplies continued, some days subsequently I paid the camp another visit at the next halting-place. My heart sickened in exercising my authority to force the poor ryots to carry the sick; but I could thank God that not one of those so employed caught infection; in fact, the disease, in this instance, was confined to the regiment, and it is remarkable that not one of the seventeen English officers suffered."

It would be a pleasure to quote other incidents from this deeply interesting book did space permit. These, however, will be sufficient to show how all-powerful is God's grace to keep a man faithful to Him under circumstances in which thousands yield to the temptations that surround them in a military camp.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Significant Words Spoken by a Dying Actor are reported in the Washington Star. It states that the dying man's wife was his faithful nurse, and he promised her that if any premonitory symptoms of death warned him of his end, if any psychological influence made itself felt, he would advise her of it. It was but a short time before his death that he called "Mary," in a voice almost indistinct to that faithful watcher. She leaned over him, and with his mouth close to her ear, he said: "The curtain will go down at eight o'clock," and at that hour precisely he died. The dying man only used the phraseology of his profession, but it was full of significance. When the curtain falls in a theatre, the players retire from the public gaze for the time, drop their assumed characters with their stage dresses, and go their ways in their own character and dress. To how many people will death so come! Great in their own estimation and in that of society, they will lay aside wealth, station, titles and honors, and go the way appointed for them like the humblest and the poorest (Rom. 14 : 12).

A Student's Night of Peril is Described in a despatch from Boston, Mass. It states that on November 8th three students set out from East Hampton to climb the mountain. Returning in the evening they attempted to make a short cut by coming down at a point where the mountain is very steep and rocky. In doing so, one of them lost his foothold and slid down some forty feet on the loose rock, but caught a twig just in time to escape death by going over a precipice. His friends could do nothing for him without help. So, building a fire that their rescuers might find them in the darkness, one remained to encourage him to hold on, while the other went to the village for help. Men went to the mountain with ropes, and before morning he was rescued from his perilous position. The anxiety of that night is never likely to be forgotten by any of the party. Whether the twig would bear the continuous strain and whether the young man would be able to maintain his hold through the weary hours of darkness were questions on which depended life or death. The student so clinging would be little inclined to levity or merriment—all his attention would be concentrated on his situation and the chances of rescue. Unsaved sinners stand in much greater peril. There is but a step between them and death, yet they often make light of the offer of eternal rescue (Matt. 22 : 2-5).

A Strange Calm Came over a Raving Maniac at Cleveland, Ohio, recently. He was a German immigrant who, soon after his arrival at Cleveland, became melancholy, and then violently demented. Nothing was known of his friends, and he was committed to the asylum. A paragraph about him, however, appeared in the local papers, and soon afterward an old German lady came to the asylum, and asked to see him, thinking he might be her son. She said that she and her husband came to this country two years ago and settled at Independence, O. As they prospered they sent money to their son, whom they had left behind in Germany, to pay his passage over. They heard that he had left Germany, but as he did not arrive they feared he must have been lost at sea. But the old lady read in the papers the description of the crazy young man confined at Cleveland, and resolved to see him. He was so violent that the attendants were afraid to admit her to his cell; but they allowed her to go into the corridor. When the little old woman stepped up to the cell door and said, "Andrew," the maniac became gentle as a child, and said "Mutter." She recognized him, and he pressed his face close to the bars, and talked to her long and rationally. He told her how he arrived in this country, and that he remembered reaching Cleveland, but all the rest was a blank. When she retired the son was again a raving maniac. The skilled physicians and experienced attendants could do nothing for him. Only the voice of the mother had power to still the tumult in that distracted mind. It is so with the madness of a sinful life; philosophers and moralists are unable to reform the degraded and vicious or to raise the fallen, but at the call of the Heavenly Father there is holiness and peace (Ps. 29 : 4, 11).

"Read your Policies" is the Advice Given by a Southern journal to those of its readers who have insured their lives. The cause of this admonition is a mistake recently made by a gentleman in Georgia. He had taken out what he supposed was a ten-year endowment policy; but he took the policy without reading it, stinted himself for ten years in order to get money to meet heavy drafts on him for premiums, and at the expiration of the time took the well-preserved policy to Atlanta for his fortune. Arriving there he was told that the paper was but an ordinary life policy, and he would have to die to obtain the money. He instituted suit against the company for equity, and the case has just been decided by the Supreme Court. The court decides that by the use of ordinary diligence the policy-holder could have known what the paper was, and refused relief. Insured people in Georgia are now reading their policies very carefully. The advice is undoubtedly good, and it would appear that it was needed. The same advice may be given to Christians. There are many people who have had a religious education and training who are hoping to be saved through the merits of Christ's atonement. The Bible is their life-policy, but through neglecting to read it regularly they fail to learn many things which they ought to know (Deut. 17 : 19-20).

Restitution by a Burglar's Mother Produced an affecting scene in a Philadelphia court on November 9th. A young man was charged with having, in company with another man, broken into a house and stolen $278. After he was convicted his aged mother came weeping to the bar, and said she desired to make restitution for her son's share in the theft. She had come all the way from Baltimore, she said, and brought her savings with her for that purpose. She produced a leather hand-bag and took out therefrom a roll of notes, all of small denominations, and counted them out into the hands of the court clerk. When the desired sum was made up there was left only enough to take her back home. The money was handed to the judge, but he declined to receive it. "Take it back," he said, "and tell this poor woman that the payment of this money will not save her son from prison. The law must be vindicated. Tell this lady this as kindly as you can, but tell her, for she must know just what she is doing." When the court's words were conveyed to the waiting mother she wept hard, but said: "Oh, I understand, I didn't hope to save my boy from prison. I pay this money because I want to do what is right. Justice is justice." "With that understanding," said the court, "let the money be received," and it was done. The judge and the sorrowing mother both recognized a principle that many people when considering their position before God often overlook. Repentance, even though accompanied by restitution and amendment of life, cannot atone for past offences. God's law like human law must be vindicated. This was effectually done on Calvary (Gal. 3 : 3).

THE SECRET OUT.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, November 18, 1883.

"Samuel said, What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?"—I. SAM. 15 : 14.

LAST Sabbath hundreds of thousands of youth, transatlantic and cisatlantic, studied this incident in international Sabbath-school lesson. The Amalekites thought that they had conquered God, and that He would never execute His threats against them. They had murdered the Israelites in battle and out of battle, and left no outrage untried. They thought that God either did not dare to punish them, or that He had forgotten so to do. Let us see. Samuel, the Lord's prophet, tells Saul to go down and destroy the Amalekites, leaving not one of them alive, and to destroy all the beasts in their possession, ox and sheep, camel and ass.

Hark to the tread of two hundred and ten thousand armed men led on by monstrous Saul ablaze with armor, his shield dangling at his side, his spear lifted in his right hand, and at the waving of which the army marched or halted. The sound of the tread is as though the great God were trampling nations into dust. I see a curling of smoke on the sky. Now there is a whole cloud of smoke. Now there is a city in a chariot of smoke behind steeds of fire. The Amalekites and Israelites confront each other. The trumpets of battle are blown peal on peal. There is

AN AWFUL DEATH HUSH.

Then at a certain signal the battle opens. Swords cut and hack, javelins clang on spears, and spears strike the shields. Arms fall from trunks, heads roll into the dust. Gash after gash. The frenzied yell. The gurgling of throttled throats. The cry of pain. The laugh of revenge. The curse hissed between clenched teeth. An army's death groan. Stacks of dead on all sides, with eye unshut and mouths yet grinning vengeance. Awful scene, that ancient battle. But huzza! for the Israelites. More than two hundred thousand men wave their plumes and clap their shields, for God has given them the victory. Huzza! for Israel.

Yet this triumphant army is soon captured and conquered by sheep and oxen. God told Saul to go and destroy the Amalekites and to destroy all the beasts in their possession. Saul thought he knew better than the Lord, and so he saves Agag, the King of the Amalekites, and saves some of the finest of the sheep and the oxen. He thinks he has cheated the prophet and through him cheated the Lord, and he is driving these sheep and oxen on toward his home. He has no idea that Samuel the prophet will ever find it out.

Samuel meets him. Saul with solemn visage—for there is no one that can look more solemn than your genuine hypocrite—Saul says: "I have fulfilled the commandment of the Lord." Samuel listens, and at that moment he hears the noisy drove in the rear, and he says to Saul: "If you have done as you have said, if you have obeyed the Lord, what meaneth the bleating of the sheep that I hear, and the lowing of the oxen in mine ear?" One would have thought that Saul's cheek would have been consumed with blushes. No. He says: "I did not do this; the army did it. The army are saving these sheep and oxen for sacrifice." Then Samuel slashes Agag to pieces, and in oriental style takes hold of the skirt of his coat and rends it apart, as much as to say, "So shall you be rent from your crown, so shall you be rent from your kingdom, and all nations shall know that Saul by disobeying God won a flock of sheep but lost a kingdom."

I. My subject first impresses me with the fact that

GOD WILL EXPOSE HYPOCRISY.

Saul thought that this whole thing had been hushed up, and he had no idea that the secret of his disobedience would ever come out, and at the most inopportune time the sheep bleat and the oxen bellowed. A hypocrite is one who professes to be what he is not, or to do that which he does not. Saul was a

TYPE OF A LARGE CLASS.

A hypocrite in our time is a man who looks awfully solemn, whines in his prayer, never laughs or smiles, or if he should be caught laughing or smiling, afterward is apologetic as though he had committed some great sin. The first time he has a chance he prays twenty minutes in a prayer-meeting, and if he give an exhortation it is with an air that seems to imply that all men are sinners save one, his modesty forbidding that he should state who that one is. In churches of Christ all over the land ecclesiastical Uriah Heeps. When the fox begins to pray look out for your chickens! The genuine impostor in religion makes a pride of his misery. The genuine Christian finds religion a joy. The hypocrite has pride in his being uncomfortable.

Those are the kind of men that damage the Church of Jesus Christ. Wolves are not of so much danger, save when they are in sheep's clothing. Arnold was of more peril to the American army than Cornwallis and his host. A ship may outride a hundred storms, and yet a handful of worms in a plank may sink it to the bottom. The Church of Jesus Christ has not so much fear of cyclones of persecution as it has of the vermin of hypocrisy sometimes infesting it.

Now, such hypocrisy will be exposed. God sees behind the curtain as well as before the curtain. God sees everything inside out. All their solemn looks will not save them. All their long prayers will not save them. All their professions of religion will not save them. Their real character will be demonstrated, and at the most unexpected moment the sheep will bleat and the oxen will bellow.

One of the cruel bishops of olden time, about to put one of the martyrs to death, began by saying, "In the name of God, Amen." The martyr said, "Don't say 'in the name of God'!" And yet how many cruel and mean things are done in the name of religion and sanctity. You sometimes see ecclesiastical courts, when they are about to devour some good brother, begin by being tremendously pious in their utterances, the venom of their assault corresponding with the heavenly pathos of the prelude. About to devour him they say grace before the meal! Just at the time when you expect them almost to rise in translation, and are beginning to think that nothing but the weight of their boots and over-coats keep them down, the sheep bleat and the oxen bellow. Ah! my friends, pretend to be no more than that you are. If you have the grace of God, profess it; but profess to have no more than you really possess. If you have none of it, do not profess to have it.

History tells of Ottocar who was asked to kneel before Randolphus I. Coming into the presence of the king, Ottocar declined to kneel, but after a while he compromised the matter and said: "I will kneel in private some time in your tent where no one sees me." But the servant of the king arranged a rope by which he could instantly let the tent drop. After a while Ottocar came into the tent and knelt before Randolphus in worship. The king's servant drew the cord and the tent dropped, and Ottocar in the presence of two great armies was kneeling before Randolphus. Ah! my friends, if you pretend that you are a servant of Jesus Christ, and at the same time are kneeling to the world, the tent has already dropped, and all the armies of heaven are gazing on the hypocrisy. The universe is a very public place, and hypocrisy always comes to exposure.

But while there is one hypocrite in the Church there are five hundred outside of it, for the field is larger. People sometimes look over into the Church, and they find here and there a hypocrite, and they denounce the Church of God. You have more on your side than we have on our side. Five hundred to one. Men who in your presence are obsequious, while at the same time they are angling for an imperfection. They are digging for a bait. Men who will be in your presence in commercial circles as genial as a summer morn, while they have the fierceness of a catamount and the slyness of a snake and the spite of a devil. But the gun they shoot off will burst in their own hands; the lies they tell crack their own teeth, and their hypocrisy will be demonstrated, and at the most unexpected time the sheep will bleat and the oxen will bellow.

II. My subject also impresses me with the fact that it is very natural to put off sin on other people. Saul confronted with his crime said:

"OH, IT WASN'T ME,

it was the army; they saved these sheep and oxen, and disobeyed the command of God. It wasn't me. Oh, no, it was the army." Human nature the same in all ages. Adam confronted with his sin said: "The woman tempted me and I did eat." And she charged it upon the serpent, and if the serpent could have spoken it would have charged it upon the devil; when the simple circumstance, I suppose, was that Adam saw Eve eating this forbidden fruit, and he begged and coaxed until he got a piece of it! Adam just as much to blame as Eve. Ah! my brother, you cannot put off your sins on other people. Saul thought he could, but he could not.

There is sitting in the gallery yonder a young man who says: "I know I do wrong sometimes. But then my father was a godless man, and my mother was a disciple of the world, and it is bad bringing up. I am not responsible." You are responsible. You have a Bible to teach you. You have a conscience to instruct you. You have a Holy Ghost to enlighten you. You know what is right and you know what is wrong. Your parents will have to bear the result of their sin. You will have to bear the result of your sin, unless you get it pardoned.

"ALL DO IT."

Seated far under the gallery there is a merchant who says: "I know sometimes in trade I don't do just that which is right, but then all the hardware men do the same thing, and all the dry-goods men do the same thing. I am no exception. That's the way they do all up and down the street. I would be peculiar, eccentric, if I didn't do that way." Ah! my brother, you cannot put off your responsibilities upon other merchants. God is going to hold you responsible. I want to quote to this entire assembly a passage of Scripture. I think you will find it in the Book of Proverbs: "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; but if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." "Oh," says Saul, "it wasn't me; it was the army."

III. My subject also impresses me with

WHAT GOD MEANS BY EXTERMINATION.

God demanded the obliteration of all of the Amalekites, and the destruction of all the beasts they owned, and Saul saves Agag, the King of the Amalekites, and those fine sheep and oxen. God said extermination. Why, do you suppose that if we have as many sins as there were men in the army of the Amalekites God is going to let us keep any of them? They have all to be exterminated.

Here is a Christian man who says: "I have an Amalekitish sin which I call jealousy." Down with jealousy. Here is a Christian man who says: "I have an Amalekitish sin which I will call backbiting." Down with backbiting. A Christian says: "I have an Amalekitish sin which is an appetite for strong drink." Down with that appetite. Meanwhile, out yonder, there is a sin lifting up its head. What is that? It is Agag. That is worldliness. That is a pet sin, it is a darling sin he is going to let live. No mercy for Agag. You cannot keep a darling sin. Extermination!

Some Presbyterians call it "the higher life;" some Methodists call it "perfection;" I do not care what you call it; but without holiness no man shall see the Lord. We have to give up all our sins, my brothers and sisters; give them all up. No mercy for Agag. Saul kept, I suppose, the finest, the fattest of the sheep, and killed the meanest. And there are many Christians who kill their unpopular sins and keep the respectable sins, while the Lord God from the heavens thunders extermination.

IV. My subject also impresses me with the fact that of religion, if it be not backed up by right behavior, amounts to nothing, and worse than nothing. Saul came out with a magnificent profession of religion. He says: "I have fulfilled the commandment of the Lord. Just look at me! See what a hero I have been!" Then the sheep bleat and the oxen bellowed. It seems to me that the Church of Christ is to make a new departure in the direction of straightout honesty. I believe the time will come when men, instead of going to commercial records to see whether a man is A 1—hearing that a man who proposes a bargain is a member of the Christian Church, a professor of religion—the merchant will say: "That is all I need."

But how much a church certificate would be worth in Wall Street to-day, judge ye! It seems to me with the world's enterprise. It used to take a good while to make a sixpenny nail. A bar would be thrust into the hot coals, and then the bellows would blow, and then the bar would be brought out on the anvil, and they would pound it and smite it and cut it and cleave it, and there would be the nail. Now, a bar is thrust into a machine, and instantly there is a whole shower of nails on the floor of the manufactory. It used to take a great while to thresh wheat. The farmer would slowly unfasten the band from the sheaf, then he would shake out the sheaf on the floor, and then he would take the slow flail and pound out the wheat from the straw. Now, the horses start, or the engine begins to hiss, and there are many sheaves instantly threshed. The printing-press that made two hundred and fifty impressions an hour was considered wonderful. Now, tens of thousands of impressions are made in the same length of time. The mail was a very slow institution. Once in two weeks it went from London to Edinburgh. Once in two weeks it went from New York to Boston. Now, a half dozen times a day you have to run to get out of the way, or you will be run over by the wagons that come through Nassau Street with whole tons of United States mail. Over eight hundred millions of letters and papers in one year going through that mail. Changes in jurisprudence. Constitution of the State of New York changed in 1846. Improvements in the criminal code. Improvements in the civil code. Law of 1773 not fit for 1883.

Now, has the Church of God kept up with the movements of the day? with art, with science, with modern travel. "Oh," says some one, "there are no new principles to be evolved in religion." Ah! I admit it. There are no new principles in nature. They are new to us, but they are old principles brought out into demonstration and into light. The law of gravitation did not wait until Isaac Newton was born. There was just as much electricity in the summer clouds before Benjamin Franklin began to play kite with the thunderstorm, as afterward; just as much power in steam before Robert Fulton was born as afterward. The carboniferous and jurassic strata of the earth did not wait to be laid down until Hugh Miller plunged his geological crowbar. They are old principles, as old as the world, but brought to new demonstration. So I say in regard to religion. If a man tells me he has a new religion, I say, "I have no faith in it, for the Bible is my standard." But if he comes and says to me, "I have a new application of the old principle," I say, "Hear, hear, hear!"

Now what I want is to have this old Gospel wheel, this grand Gospel wheel which has turned so magnificently so many years, to have it, that band connecting it with every shop, with every store, with every banking house, with every institution, with every place of hard work—the religion of Jesus Christ making its conquest in the direction of common honesty, so that when a man shall say, as Saul said, "I have fulfilled the commandment of the Lord," everybody will believe him.

V. My subject also impresses me with the fact that

YOU CANNOT DEFRAUD GOD.

Saul thought he had cheated God out of these few sheep and oxen. Did he successfully cheat God? Oh, no. At the most unexpected moment the sheep bleat and the oxen bellowed. Neither Saul nor any other man can cheat God. God under the Old Testament demanded a tenth part of a man's income. I suppose religion is worth as much under our brighter dispensation certainly as it was under the darker dispensation. God demanded a tenth part of a man's estate for religious objects, and demanding a tenth under the darker dispensation, I suppose religion is worth as much now under ours. Suppose a man has an income of $10,000 a year, and that man gives to religious objects $500. Has he given the tenth? No. Where are the other $500? God will get it just as certainly as you live or die. You cannot cheat God. Suppose a man has $100,000 a year income, and he says: "Now I'll compromise this matter with God, and I'll give Him $2000." Where are the other $8000? God will get that in some way.

God sometimes comes into a commercial establishment, and He says practically and in substance: "Now you have had great prosperity for ten, twenty, thirty years. Where is the $10,000? When the poor came to you, you kicked them off the steps. When Christian objects appealed to you for help you discarded them. You would not give the $10,000; now I will take it all away." It is all gone. That is the history of hundreds of establishments in the United States. There are many cases where the benevolent are unfortunate, and the large hearted and the charitable, and then it is a matter of Providential discipline to bring a man nearer to the heart of God; but in the other case it is a judgment, an awful judgment. "You would not give the $10,000; now I will take it all."

God said to Jonah, "Go to Nineveh." "I won't go; I'll go to Tarshish." He started for Tarshish. Did he get there? The seas raged, the winds blew, the ship rocked. Come, ye whales, and take this passenger for Tarshish. No man ever got to Tarshish if the Lord told him to go to Nineveh. The seas would not bear him; they are God's seas. The winds would not waft him; they are God's winds. If a man deliberately sets out to do that which God declares he must not do, the natural world as well as God is against him, and the lightnings are ready to strike him, and the fires are ready to consume him, and the sun is ready to smite him, and the waters are ready to drown him, and the earth is ready to devour him.

They whose fine robes are woven out of human heartstrings, they whose fine houses are built out of human skulls, they whose up-springing fountains are the tears of oppressed nations—have they successfully robbed God? Oh, no. In the last day will be demonstrated not only God's goodness, but His

the right, to vindicate His own government and to vindicate the cause of His oppressed children—black, white, copper-colored.

Awake, ye martyred dead, and come—come from dungeons where folded darkness hearsed you, and chains like cankers wore loose the skin and wore off the flesh, and rattled on the marrowless bones. Come up from the stakes where you were consumed and where the hand lifted for mercy dropped into ashes. Come from valleys of Piedmont, and Smithfield Square, and London Tower and the Highlands of Scotland. Come in great procession and clap your bony hands together, and stamp your mouldy feet, and let all the chains that ever bound you clank at once, and all the flames that consumed you be lifted into one great arm of fire pleading for a judgment. Gather all the tears ye ever wept into a lake, and all the sighs ye ever breathed into a tempest, and all the agonies ye ever suffered into a groan, and let the heaven piercing chain-clank and the tempest-sigh and the thunder-groan announce to earth and hell and heaven a judgment! Oh, my friends, we may cheat our fellows, but in that day it will be demonstrated that we cannot cheat God.

My brothers and sisters in Christ, culture Christian frankness. Never be hypocritical in conversation or in behavior. Have no favorite sins you cannot extirpate. Away with all the Amalekites. No mercy for Agag. You say that human strength is not sufficient. I admit it. But God's grace is sufficient. That which helped Daniel in the den, that which sustained Joseph in the pit, that which shielded Shadrac in the fire, that which cheered Paul in the Mediterranean cyclone.

Mrs. Van Cott has Issued a New and Cheap edition of the autobiographical narrative of her labors under the title of "The Harvest and the Reaper." Mrs. Van Cott's life has been an active one, full of useful work in the churches, and the record of it, as presented in this interesting volume of three hundred and sixty pages, will be read with profit and pleasure. She has much to tell of the Lords' blessings vouchsafed in answer to prayer and of remarkable conversions, in which He has used her instrumentality for His glory. The book is issued in a neat stiff paper cover with an excellent portrait; price, fifty cents.

The Rev. Thomas McCullagh, the Newly elected President of the English Wesleyan Conference, has been suddenly prostrated by severe illness. The brief report sent of the sad event does not state the nature of the illness, but intimates that it will prevent his entering on his official duties for some time to come.

The Changes made in the Liturgy of the Episcopal Church by the recent convention of Philadelphia do not affect doctrine or the formal statement of it. The convention adopted the report of a committee appointed three years ago to consider "the enrichment and flexibility of the liturgy and its adaptation to the changed conditions of national life. It was composed of seven bishops, seven clergymen, and seven laymen. The changes recommended by the committee and adopted by the convention consist in furnishing proper Psalms for a larger number of festivals; an increase of the sentences with which the service opens; the addition of a prayer for State Legislatures, in the prayer for Congress, and the provision of alternate canticles for a Te Deum. A special service called the Beatitudes of the Gospel, to be used at Evening Prayer with responses is also added. Another addition in the occasional offices is a special service for the burial of infants. There are other changes of a minor character and also for shortened services on days other than Sundays.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Murdered Woman's Last Wish.—At a Recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Wallace said: "Lately I heard of a visit paid to a dying woman by a canon of the Church of England. In a fit of drunken fury, her husband had struck her a blow which injured her so badly that virtually he killed his patient, long-suffering wife. Her last words to the canon were, 'Deal kindly with him, he was a kind husband when not in drink.' A large number of people followed her to the grave, and there, knowing what had been the cause of her death, they drew the sword and threw away the scabbard, declaring instant and steady war against the accursed trade."

Singular Freaks of a Drunkard.—Major Colquhoun related, at a recent meeting at Brownfield: "We have many instances of the power of God in the northern district. Somewhere about half-past ten last night, a dark, drizzling night it was, a man spoke to me in the street. He professes to have a great contempt for God's Word, for the meetings, and everything relating to religion. The peculiar thing about him is, that whenever he takes any drink, he cannot keep away from the meetings. Standing in the street, we had prayer together, but almost before we finished, he produced a flask of whiskey, saying, 'This is for to-morrow morning.' 'Give it to me,' I said. 'No, sir;' he answered, 'what should I do in the morning?' then, as though afraid, he ran away into darkness. I believe we shall yet gain him for Christ."

A Contingent of Christian Soldiers.—At the noonday meeting on August 28th, Mr. Crossbie said: "A colonel in one of our Indian regiments had a weekly prayer-meeting in an upper room. It was very small, and so he was beginning to get discouraged. One evening he was sitting almost if not quite alone, when he heard the steady tramp of a body of men coming toward his hall. At the door they halted, and then came right up-stairs, and between thirty and forty men sat down in the room. On inquiring, he learned that they belonged to a regiment just arrived in camp from Cork, and that their first inquiry was for a meeting to which they could go, and marched straight to it when they were told the way. These men were converted in Cork through the untiring efforts of a lady who held meetings there for soldiers."

The Only One that Escaped.—Mr. Scott Related the following suggestive incident: "A young boy on board ship was out at sea in the midst of a great storm. He did not know much about our Saviour Jesus, but he had heard that Jesus was one who could help those in distress who trusted in Him. The boy went to his father, who was in very great distress, and said, 'Won't you trust in God, father?' 'Trust in God? there is no use of that here. I know the ship, the sea, and storm; there is no deliverance for us.' The boy continued, 'Won't you trust Him?' But none in the ship would listen to him, so the boy put himself in the hands of Jesus in the midst of that storm. Out of all the ship's company the boy alone was saved. He was washed ashore insensible, but life was not gone. He was soon restored, and is now a devoted servant of Christ."

A Marvel in a "Rookery."—Major Colquhoun said: "I wish to speak about the work of the Bethany Hall workers in the 'Rookery,' which is, as many of you know, a den of thieves. I am told that it was once dangerous for a stranger to enter it without the protection of the police. I had the pleasure of conducting the Gospel-meeting on Saturday night, and exhibiting a few views with the magic lantern, and found that the people had actually no imagination. The most beautiful views were passed unheeded, but scenes of real life, such as a garret with a man lying dying in it, reached them at once. One encouraging case as a sample of the work will bear relating. Two months ago a deplorable-looking man, with the effects of drink flaming on his face, gave his heart to the Lord, and on Saturday last he was the busiest man for Christ in the meeting. Not only that, but he was nicely dressed, and his face had assumed quite a healthy appearance. Who dare limit the cleansing energy of Christ's precious blood, or doubt His willingness and ability to save even to the uttermost!"

Dagon Falling before the Ark.—Mr. McMicking said at the same meeting: "The missionary, Mr. Lewis, tells us a strange story which runs as follows. A young man in India heard the Scriptures read and explained by a missionary, and at once he went home to his own village, where he told all he heard to the villagers, dilating with marked enthusiasm on the love of the great God in sending His Son to die for guilty man. Some twenty people were converted to Christ, and sent for Mr. Lewis, paying his expenses to the place. The young man died ere Mr. Lewis reached the village, but those remaining were warm in their new faith, and heard the Word gladly. They are now trying to extend the knowledge of salvation all around them. Thus it is that everywhere in India the usurping Dagon of Idolatry is falling before the ark of God."

Cheques with Good Names on Them.—"I called upon a business man to speak about my Master; he replied to my question, 'I don't feel right.' 'Do you get many cheques?' I asked. 'Yes,' he replied, 'every day I get some.' 'Do you feel anything when you get them?' 'Yes. I am glad.' 'Why?' 'Because I know they are the same as money to me.' 'That is simply because you believe in the name written at the foot, that the money will be paid when you ask it from the banker?' 'Yes, that's it.' 'That's just it with God,' I said; 'you have only to go with the name of Jesus, and you will receive entire forgiveness of your sins, then you will feel glad enough.' 'Praise the Lord, I will trust Him ever after this,' was his earnest answer. That 'Praise the Lord' went straight to my heart, for it was the joy of a soul new-born by the Holy Spirit. Such joy will never end."

A Letter from the Battle-field.—Mr. Wookey related: "Just before the Egyptian War broke out I was in Chatham, where I saw a good deal of one side of our soldiers' lives. The evening before they sailed for Egypt thirty young men came to the house in which I lived, and asked me to pray with them. It was one of those times in my life in which I could not pray audibly. The men were not all Christians, but some were, and the rest were seekers. We knelt down. No words came to my lips, but we all burst into floods of tears, and I believe that the Holy Spirit visited many then. After we rose from our knees, one young Scotchman beckoned me to come out of the room. I took him up to my bedroom, where for three or four hours he told me his life's story. He was the only son of a widow in Edinburgh, and had run away to London, where he spent his time and money in dissipation. When all was gone he enlisted into a regiment which was stationed at Chatham, and was ordered out to the field of war. Before he left England he was converted to Christ, and just before the battle in which he was killed, he sent me a letter written with lead-pencil, only an hour or so before he fell, telling me of the peace and joy which he found in Jesus."

Burglary by a Schoolmaster.—Mr. Dickson said: "A few months ago, a shabby-genteel man came to our house asking to hire our hall for a high-class school. He had testimonials from professors in Aberdeen and Glasgow, so that we let him have it. He issued a prospectus, and put a notice in the window that he taught Greek, Latin, German, French, and I don't know what besides. We used to wonder why so clever a man was always so shabby; it did not seem to matter how many pupils he got, he never improved in appearance. We soon found it was the old story of drink. We got him to sign the pledge, but no further would he go, entreat as we would. One morning we heard that a neighbor's house had been broken into, and valuables stolen from it, and soon, to our surprise, learned that this man was arrested by the police as the burglar. He was tried and sentenced to five years' penal servitude. We visited him in prison, and as we stood at the iron cage we saw in the dim distance a figure dressed in convict's clothes coming toward us. We did not recognize him till the jailor called out, 'Come quick, Ferguson.' We spoke to him about the necessity of even now giving his heart to Christ, but he did not do it then. He gave us a message to his old pupils; it was, 'Tell them to take warning by me and have nothing to do with the drink.'"

THE TEN-KINGDOMED CONFEDERACY.

Progress in One Generation.

By B. Wills Newton.

The Career of the Approaching Decem-regal Confederacy—Progress Made in Twenty-five Years—The Issue not Doubtful—France and Germany—The Immediate Cause of the Franco-Prussian War—The Future of Germany—The Daring Infidelity of France—The Position and Peril of England—A Uniform Sacerdotalism Impossible—The Drag-net of Antichrist—The Triumph of Latitudinarianism.

THE teaching of prophecy is that ten democratic monarchies will divide between them the Roman world and will, federally united, inaugurate, and, for a season, sustain the reign of Latitudinarian Antichristianism, until at last, wearied and harassed by the confusion and strife which Latitudinarianism must necessarily engender, and desiring also a more complete annihilation of the truth than Latitudinarianism can, in consistency with its principles effect, the Monarchs of the Ten Kingdoms will give themselves over to an organized system of atheistic infidelity, and will avowedly reject both Jehovah and Christ (see Psalm 2), and, being of one mind, will "give their power and authority to the Beast"—Antichrist.

Then, throughout the whole Roman world all whose names are not written in the Lamb's Book of Life will glorify and worship him; for "the Dragon will give him his power, and his throne, and great authority" (Rev. 12 : 2). Such will be the end of the boasted liberty of human thought. Just in proportion as men throw off from themselves the restraint of God and of His truth, they become abject servants and slaves of Satan. While imagining themselves to be free, they blindly seek after, serve, and worship, whatever Satan proposes to them.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS.

The progress that has been made during the last twenty-five years (from 1848 to 1873) in bringing into closer association with each other most of the countries of the Roman world, and in separating (either legislatively or completely) from the Roman kingdoms countries that do not fall within the Roman boundary, has been very marked. The Crimean War in 1854-55 brought the eastern part of the Roman world into a much closer association than before with the western Roman nations; and the union then formed does not seem likely to be even temporarily interrupted. Community of interest, especially in a day like the present, is a bond of wondrous tenacity and strength. The Crimean War, too, recovered the greater part of Bessarabia (for Bessarabia belongs to the Roman world) from the grasp of Russia.

Hungary, the centre of which does not fall within the Roman boundary, has been legislatively separated from Austria, and further changes are imminent there, as well as in all those non-Roman countries which Austria has vainly endeavored to fuse into political identity with herself. The seemingly indissoluble bond which kept Austria in close political association with Prussia and the other non-Roman States of northern Germany, was severed so suddenly and unexpectedly as to electrify Europe. The work of centuries was destroyed in a moment. Yet men needed not to have so marvelled. It was a necessary event; for the Roman nations, being appointed to be the centre of the world's greatness during the closing period of its evil history, must move in a separate circle, and have a peculiar history of their own.

Ireland (which is non-Roman) feverishly restless and, victimised to priestcraft, is yearly weakening the ties by which she has been linked to England. Italy, which, twenty years ago, seemed more distant than ever from attaining the objects of her long-cherished hopes (the acquisition of Rome as her capital) has at last succeeded. Rome is hers, and constitutional or democratic monarchy is established both in Italy and Austria. Austria, once the great pillar of the Papacy, and the enemy and trampler-down of Italy, has changed her course, and become Italy's friend. The temporal sovereignty of the Papacy over the city of Rome ceased in 1870; and although the canon law is still throughout Western Europe, struggling with the civil law for supremacy, yet the latter triumphs. The supremacy of ecclesiastical power must finally give way to the sceptre of the secular monarch. The struggle may be prolonged and prove most disastrous in its consequences, but

THE ISSUE IS NOT DOUBTFUL.

There has been, it is true, one most important event that has seemed to stay or turn back the tide of progress, as respects the territorial development of the Ten Kingdoms. The Franco-German War, instead of giving back to France those portions of Roman territory which Prussia had formerly annexed (viz., Rhenish Prussia, west of the Rhine), ended, in 1871, in giving more to Prussia, so that Prussia's position on the west bank of the Rhine, instead of being weakened, has been materially strengthened. This may seem to be a retrograde movement; and in one respect it is; but, in another and more important point of view, it is not. The Franco-German War will be found in result to have accelerated rather than retarded the expected development.

For many years past, France has been the great obstructor to the development of the Ten Kingdoms. France and the Papacy have been confederates in obstruction. France had for her darling object pre-eminence among the nations of Europe. Despising equality, she coveted leadership. Professedly the patroness of liberty, she was, nevertheless, quite willing to keep on the neck of other countries (such as Rome and Spain) the most cruel and oppressive yokes, if her own pre-eminence was aided thereby. Accordingly, France schemed for a Latin League, of which she was to be the head, and which was in Western Europe to extirpate "the clay," and to return to "the iron" alone. What was "Cæsarism" but this? Imperialism was to sustain Ecclesiastcism, and before this twofold power the modern "clay-iron" governmental theories were to perish.

Accordingly, Italy and other neighboring States were kept down by France, and their native energies crippled. Italy was to be terrified by threats, and Spain debased and enfeebled by priestcraft. Even the development of the East was by France impeded unless the development accorded with her desires. If Egypt advanced, it must be under the tutelage of France, and Tunis was to be a French appanage. A plot, formed by the Imperial Government in France and the Papal Government in Rome, against the liberties of Western Europe and against Protestanism, was doubtless, as evidence goes to show. The immediate with Prussia. Soldiers supplied by France and legions of priests supplied and controlled from Rome, were to inaugurate and sustain the new régime.

It was a dark and deadly plot, but God mercifully interposed and frustrated it. God fought against France, and dashed to the ground her atrocious schemes. Instantly the secular power of the Papacy fell; Italy, for the first time, became really free, and the iron hand of France was removed (in all probability, finally) from her and from other nations. The establishment of the freedom of Italy, the confirmation of the severance between Austria and Northern Germany, the fall of the temporal power of the Papacy, the determination evinced in Italy and elsewhere to secure the supremacy of the civil over the canon law, are, as respects the progress of the Ten Kingdoms, events of far greater moment than the temporary annexation to Germany of a few provinces of France. It may be that France may not regain her lost territory until the development of the Ten Kingdoms in federal union; or they may be regained previously, either by convention or by the sword. The present monarch of Prussia and Germany fears and honors God, and God has prospered him; but His subjects, previously leavened with infidelity and radicalism, have, since their contact with France, received much added moral poison, which is pregnant with calamitous results.

THE FUTURE OF GERMANY.

The horizon of Germany is not devoid of clouds of dark and threatening aspect. The storm may be comparatively distant; but if it come, it will probably come with a violence and fury as yet unparalleled. (See Heine's "Anticipations Respecting the Future of Germany.") An explosion there would strike Europe more terribly than any that has occurred in France; for there is a strength and vigor and manhood in Germany that the childishness and fickleness and quickly cowed spirit of France knows not. But it is sufficient to say that the moral changes that are in progress through the victories of Prussia, are of infinitely greater moment than the temporary loss of provinces by France. It should be remembered, too, that territorial changes are not, like moral changes, necessarily slow. They may be accomplished in a day.

THE DARING INFIDELITY OF FRANCE.

Is there any nation upon the earth which, since the period of the Reformation, has more daringly outraged and defied God than France? Inconstant in other things, she has been constant in her rejection of God. At the time of the Reformation she was favored with much Protestant light. Many a herald of mercy was sent to her, and Calvin, one of the chief pillars of the Reformation, was raised up from among her own people. The history of France differs from that of Spain as to this. Spain was not to the same extent favored with light. Spain never had a Calvin. But the trumpet of truth was loudly sounded in the ears of France, and marked results followed—results that gave to France prolonged opportunities of judging between light and darkness, God and Baal. Deliberately she rejected the omnipotent God, and chose Baal.

Since then France has had many a vicissitude. Time for reflection has been allowed her; opportunity for becoming acquainted with the Scripture has been afforded, but again every mercy has been despised. It may, I believe, be safely said, that France was never more morally depraved, that she was never more socially and governmentally base, and that her rulers were never bent upon a fouler and more abominable design than when she made her sudden, tiger-like spring at Prussia in 1870.

HAS ENGLAND TAKEN WARNING?

England, absorbed in the pursuit of "material" interests, having Mammon for her idol, and lavishing honors and rewards on Intellect, wherever found, if only she thinks that such intellect will consent to serve and worship her idol—England takes warning from nothing. Her eye is closed, her ear heavy, Syren-sounds, which Satan has gathered around her, have lulled her, and she desires not to awaken. Her responsibilities are greater even than those of France; for a period of light, far brighter and more extended in time than that granted to France, has been vouchsafed to her; and she has had opportunity to profit by the lessons that the histories of France, and Spain, and Italy have afforded. She has had full opportunity of considering the difference between nations in which the Bible has been honored, as the one authoritative record of God's will, and nations in which a selfish Ecclesiasticism has reigned.

England, on many occasions of danger and need, has had the shield of the Most High God marvellously stretched out over her, because the Bible, and not the so-called Church, was acknowledged as having the authority of God. But now all is changed. Notwithstanding the withering curse that Popery has so manifestly brought on neighboring nations (witness the present condition of Spain) — notwithstanding the deadly savage infidelity that has sprung up in those nations as a result of the ignorance and moral debasement resulting from Priestcraft, a large and influential section of the high-born and educated in England are rushing back into the darkness and idolatries of Romanism, with an unreflecting, fanatical eagerness that astonishes, while it delights, the well-trained Papal emissaries who have been sent out to snare and decoy. They have little need of their subtlety—little need of their practised skill. The net is scarcely spread, when the willing foot hastens into it. The cold, solid, heartless indifference of England to that which the powers of darkness are effecting within her borders, is one of the most appalling spectacles that the history of mankind has yet presented.

No one form of sacerdotal religiousness, whether Jewish, Roman, Greek, Anglican, or Mahommedan, will ever succeed in raising itself into universal dominancy. The days of such humiliation are past. The governmental plans to be adopted now must be such as will subserve the interests and commend themselves to the awakened intelligence of the wide world. Do the counsellors of the Vatican dream that they would succeed (even if Protestantism were extinguished) in forcing into the narrow circle of their "infallible" Popish rule the rising intelligence of Egypt and Greece, European and Asiatic Turkey, and Northern Africa, not to speak of Russia, India, China, and Japan, and of scattered but influential Israel?

THE DRAG-NET

of the coming Antichrist, that is to enclose this multitude of peoples, must be somewhat larger than any that ecclesiastic Rome ever has handled. An hour is drawing nigh when Antichrist, a more terrible personage than Mahomet, will appear, and Rome and Athens, Egypt and Assyria, Antioch and Jerusalem, will, with England and the West, enter his mighty "drag-net," and be for a time the servants of his glory. Before him the whole Roman world will bow down and worship for three and a half years.

Herod must become latitudinarian, or he must cease to reign. Accordingly, in countries such as Egypt, Turkey, and Tunis, where Mahommedanism has hitherto been in the ascendant, we are beginning to see its exclusiveness resigned. So also in countries where Popery has dominated, other influences are penetrating. Austria and Italy are examples. In England, where Protestantism once ruled, Popery, availing itself of the aid of that truthless Latitudinarianism which is seeking to introduce equality of creeds, has strengthened itself both within and without the Anglican Establishment; and so the dominancy of Protestantism in England falls. At present, is being prepared. Ultimately, indeed, when the time shall come for Antichrist to be revealed in the full power of his unfettered, despotic sway, the hell-woven web will become altogether black. There will be strict unity then—unity in atheistic blasphemy. But the transgressors are not "come to the full." At present, the web that Satan is intending to weave is one of divers colors. The throne of Latitudinarianism is established on the principles and policy of expediency and compromise. Before it Ecclesiasticism will (perhaps at no very distant period) be made to cease from its vauntings, and will become content to occupy only a niche in the Pantheon of Truthlessness. The true servants of Christ only will refuse to join in the unholy concord. Mordecai-like, they will refuse to bow; but they will have to seal their testimony with their blood.

A PATCH-WORK GARMENT

CURRENT EVENTS.

That the Secretary of the Treasury has Issued another call for bonds, this time to the amount of ten million dollars, is an evidence of the large surplus again rolling up of national income over expenditure. Mr. Folger has doubtless acted wisely in thus applying the balance in the Treasury to the reduction of the debt, but the fact of his having that balance at command, will, it may be hoped, be considered by Congress. The sinking fund, if unaided, will liquidate the whole remaining debt in twenty-five years, which will be an achievement of which any nation might be proud, and there is therefore no need to press forward the extinction by the aggregation of a surplus. If Congress will remove from the shoulders of taxpayers a portion of their heavy burden it will act wisely. There are indications in the financial centres of the country that a time of severe distress is approaching; our legislators can find no more useful occupation than that of giving such relief to the people as will mitigate, if not avert, the calamity. They will be guilty of culpable negligence if they permit the present unnecessarily heavy taxation to continue.

The Inquiry into the Proteus Disaster now being conducted in Washington, shows that there was confusion in the management of the expedition from the commencement, and that responsibility for the failure to relieve Lieutenant Greely must be distributed among many officials. Lieutenant Garlington appears never to have understood that he was expected to land stores at Littleton Island, although his not doing so has been characterized as disobedience of orders. In his evidence, given last week, Lieutenant Garlington said nothing had ever occurred at the Signal Office before his departure which contemplated or suggested, so far as he knew, leaving any stores at Littleton Island on his way north. To have done so would have consumed sixty or seventy hours. The considerations which would have deterred him from staying at Littleton Island to land stores while on his way north were that the weather was good; but during such a delay, the entire conditions might change; the movements of the icepack could not be foreseen; the delay might have been disastrous, and it was considered best to push northward while the conditions were favorable; the instructions were to take advantage of every favorable lead. As to the condition of the Proteus and the capacity of the vessel for service in a case of so much importance to the lives of Lieutenant Greely and his companions, startling evidence was given by another witness. Lieutenant Colwell, of the navy, said he considered the equipment of the Proteus very bad. Her owners, before the vessel was chartered for the trip, had arranged to have her sent home to Scotland that repairs might be made to her boilers, which were defective; her boats were unseaworthy; she had four boats, two of which would float and two of which would not; when on the frames daylight could be seen through their seams; the rigging of the ship was very old; the ship's compasses were untrustworthy; she had one patent log, which was lost by backing and coiling it around the propeller. Whatever may be the verdict of the court, the public will take such evidence of this into account in apportioning the blame for this most deplorable disaster.

A Proposal Emanating from the Board of Trade and Transportation was published last week, declaring that Congress should speedily provide for the redemption or exchange of trade dollars at their face value or some other equitable rate. It is no doubt desirable that the trade dollars should be eliminated from the circulation, but if Congress consented to redeem them at their face value, the interests of the people would be sacrificed to benefit the speculators who have bought up the coins at their bullion value. An effort to effect legislation of this character will in all probability be made at the next Congress, and the people should be on their guard against it.

The Anti-Chinese Immigration Act has not succeeded in completely preventing the influx of Chinamen. Complaints are made by the Anti-Chinese party that the law is being violated. It is stated that Chinese laborers are being smuggled across the frontier from British Columbia, that others have passed the Custom Houses with certificates from their own government describing them as travellers or traders, though they are really laborers, and that the recent decision of the Court permitting Chinamen to return who left this country prior to the passing of the bill will lead to many more entering by personation. Evidently the Chinese immigrants have pitted their ingenuity against the ingenuity of Congress, and the victory has not been with Western civilization.

The New Time Standard was Adopted by the Board of Aldermen, of New York, and on Sunday last at noon the clocks in the city were set back three minutes and fifty-eight and one-half seconds in accordance with the standard. The new standard was generally adopted in other cities, Chicago being the most conspicuous exception. Washington also was an exception, as that city will have to await the action of Congress. The change is generally welcomed, as the confusion and inconvenience of having fifty-three different standards in one country has been extreme. Under the new standard, the minute hand of all correct timepieces between the Atlantic and the Pacific will point to the same figure, and the hour hand will alone indicate to the traveller his entrance into a new time zone.

Mr. W. Forbes, of London, Addressed a large assemblage in Dr. Goodwin's Church in Chicago, on November 13th. The Chicago Herald states that in the course of his address Mr. Forbes made an earnest and eloquent appeal to Christian workers to organize efforts for the benefit of the class for whom Mr. Forbes has done so much in his own country—namely the people employed in the theatres. Mr. Forbes has endeavored to reach all whose occupation is in and about the theatre, the ballet-girls, juvenile dancers, acrobats, dressers, carpenters, scene-shifters, etc., and in his address he described his methods and success for the encouragement of his hearers in making efforts in Chicago in the same direction. The efforts to bring the "glad tidings" to all these theatrical attendants are still being continued by regular tea gospel meetings at Lower Exeter Hall. While bent on this mission Mr. Forbes has, of course, frequently met with all kinds of pathetic incidents. He remembers the case of two poor, motherless girls, whose duties required them to dance nightly at the Alhambra, in Leicester Square, and who had to do this one evening while their father, whom they had supported for a number of years, was lying dead in his coffin in their dingy little apartments. Mr. Forbes has been placed by Dr. Goodwin in communication with a number of Christian workers with the view of organizing a theatrical mission in Chicago.

Mr. Francis Murphy, the Famous Gospel Temperance orator, has just closed a series of successful meetings at Newark, N. J. The Central Methodist Episcopal Church, in which the meetings were held, is a very large building, but large numbers were unable to obtain admission, it being crowded to its utmost capacity long before the hour for commencing. It is estimated that not less than thirty thousand persons signed the pledge, among whom were many inebriates considered hopeless. Mr. Murphy will soon commence a series of meetings in Brooklyn, N. Y., at the urgent request of evangelical ministers, after which he is prepared to accept engagements in other cities.

The Canvass of the Country by the Agents of the American Bible Society, with the object of supplying for the fourth time every family without a Bible with a copy of the sacred book, is progressing rapidly. At the November meeting of the Board of Managers, reports were presented showing that in the prosecution of the work, 222 colporteurs had, during the month of October, visited 62,778 families, and that 8565 of them were found without a copy of the Scriptures. They sold 26,640 copies, and distributed 6519 gratuitously; the value of the books sold being $10,419.02, and the value of those given away $1,720.99.

Two Beautifully Illustrated Books Suitable for Christmas presents to children have been issued by Mr. R. Worthington, of New York. Worthington's Annual, price $1.50, is a quarto book of about 250 pages, containing: A series of interesting stories; papers on Natural History and 300 engravings, some of them in colors. Chatterbox-Junior, price $1.25, is also full of pictures and stories such as are the delight of the nursery. There are also a new supply in it of rhymes for the very little ones. Mr. Worthington in producing both works has earned and will doubtless receive hearty thanks from the juveniles in all our cities who are fortunate enough to obtain possession of one or other of them.

The Attack made on Luther's Memory by two prominent Roman Catholic preachers in this country on Nov. 11th, has been widely circulated by the press. It was not to be expected that the enthusiastic celebration of Luther's birthday should pass without some such attack being made. Monsignor Capel denounced Luther personally for breaking his oath of celibacy, contended that Protestantism tends to agnosticism and communism, and claimed that the Roman Catholic Church in Luther's day was not so corrupt as the reformer alleged she was. Facts are, however a sufficient answer to the preacher. The condition of society in Protestant lands, if compared with that of the lands in which Roman Catholicism flourishes, shows that Protestantism, apart from its spiritual blessings, is also a social blessing; while the fact that Luther, when a devoted and enthusiastic priest, returned from Rome disgusted by the immorality and licentiousness of the Papal Court, is evidence of the corruption then existing in the very heart of the Church. Luther undoubtedly broke his oath of celibacy, but it was an oath taken under a delusion and one from which he believed he was absolved by the circumstances of his separation from the Romish Church. Dr. Brann, the other preacher who attacked Luther, devoted himself to personal charges, apparently following the maxim of a certain lawyer, "When you have no case abuse the plaintiff's attorney."

The Centennial Anniversary of Evacuation Day will be observed in New York with appropriate ceremonies on November 26th. Mayor Edson has issued a proclamation calling attention to the fact that the anniversary of the day on which the British fleet weighed anchor and sailed from the Bay of New York, falls this year on Sunday, November 25th. He therefore recommends that business be suspended on the following day, "and that all public and private offices and places of business in the city be closed, in order that all the people of the city of New York may participate in the celebration of this hundredth anniversary of the culminating event of the Revolution." Committees have been appointed by the Board of Aldermen, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Historical Society to confer together and make arrangements for "a joyous commemoration" of the day when our ancestors shook off British rule.

A German Nobleman was Found Working as a day laborer on the Illinois Central Railroad recently. A despatch from Chicago on November 9th states that the administrator of the Prince of Salm, a German noble of great wealth, had visited that city in quest of his employer's son and heir. The young man had left his home, owing to a quarrel with his father, and nothing had been heard of him for more than a year. Very recently the prince received a letter from a German residing in Chicago, stating that there was living in the same house with him a young man whom the writer believed to be a member of the Salm family. The young men were both working in the capacity of laborers, and had become friends. On receiving that information, Prince Salm despatched to Chicago his administrator, who persuaded both young men to return with him to Germany, the one to receive a father's pardon, and the other to receive a reward for his intelligence and sagacity. There are many wanderers from God whom we cannot persuade to return, but to whom we can render the best of all services by telling their Heavenly Father of them. For such service there is a specified reward (James 5 : 20).

Money was Found in a Skeleton's Mouth Recently at Andermatt in Switzerland. Some workmen were repairing the wall that runs around the old churchyard there when, in the course of their excavations, they suddenly came upon several skeletons, and on disturbing them there fell from the lower jaw of one two gold coins of the reign of Charles VIII. of France, at the end of the fifteenth century. Further search revealed the presence in the bony hand of the skeleton of a piece of linen rag in excellent preservation, and on unfolding the rag the men brought to light ten silver coins of the sixteenth century, of the time of François I. of France. There is no means of knowing now how the money came to be in so strange a place. It may have been placed there by superstitious friends of the dead, or death might have suddenly come upon a man who was carrying his money in that way. One thing, however, is certain, the money had not been used. The fact that it remained with the dead occasions no surprise; it is just what we would expect; but when we see how men scheme and labor and hoard, it would seem that they have forgotten that it is of no use beyond the grave (Ps. 49 : 6-8).

A Treacherous Natural Beauty Characterizes some well-known localities in New York City, if we may credit a series of articles which have recently appeared in the Times. That journal asserts that three squares which are much frequented, especially in summer, are not healthful breathing places, but the haunts of malaria and breeding-places of disease. It declares that under these three squares struggle some of the most important of the old water-courses of the island. They are choked up by refuse, but they are still streams, saturating the ground with moisture and exhaling from the surface unhealthy vapors. Unfitted by reason of these streams for dwelling-places and rejected by builders because of their unfitness, these moist areas were selected by the city for public squares, because the land was cheap. The streams were not kept open nor drained, but were filled up. The writer of the articles expresses his conviction that the choked streams produce malaria, and states in confirmation of the theory that during the past twenty-five years there has been a fatal prevalence of certain diseases in the localities mentioned. If these facts are correct the places are most deceptive. On fine days in summer aged people and invalids may be seen sitting on the seats there, while children play around under the care of their nurses. Even busy men, as they pass, regret that they must plod along the dusty and foul-smelling streets instead of enjoying a rest under the trees with the velvety turf beneath their feet. It would appear, however, that rest there is attended with danger. There are similar experiences in our spiritual life. The busy, earnest worker is not so often assailed by temptation as those who rest in pleasant places like Bunyan's pilgrim on "the enchanted ground" (Matt. 26 : 41).

The Drowning of Seven Persons in the Storm of November 11th is reported from Pelosky, Mich. A despatch from that place states that in the afternoon of that day the State Superintendent of Fisheries, accompanied by his assistant and foreman, entered a boat manned by four experienced and steady men to cross the Bay. The party left the harbor in spite of earnest remonstrances not to attempt the perilous passage. When about half-way across, the boat was seen to capsize. Although it seemed impossible for a boat to live in such a sea, a volunteer crew made a desperate attempt to rescue two of the party, who could be plainly seen from the shore clinging to the boat, but were unable to reach them, on account of the blinding snowstorm and heavy sea, and were hardly able to get back themselves. The following day the boat was washed ashore with one of its sides stove in, but the bodies have not yet been recovered. All the party were familiar with the currents and the shores, but they overestimated their power to cope with so terrible a storm. It is often so in the storms of life. Many a noble human bark for which a useful and glorious voyage was predicted has gone down in a storm of trial through self-confidence. Those who trust in Christ for strength and not in their own righteousness, alone are safe (1 Cor. 10 : 12).

Fifteen Weeks Spent on a Barren Island was the experience of a Spanish sailor who recently arrived at San Francisco. He states, in a narrative published in the San Francisco Alta, that he was steward on board the St. Clair, of Thomaston, Me., which sailed from New York on December 18th, 1882 with an assorted cargo bound for Nagasaki, Japan. On the 1st of May she struck on the shoaling shores of one of the Sunda Islands and became a total wreck. The weather was stormy, and the waves, which were running very high, rendered futile all possible efforts to save anything. The captain, knowing the island to be uninhabited, determined to try to reach another island by the boats, but the steward fearing the storm determined to remain until the Japanese fishermen visited the island. It was not the season for fishing, and the place was not visited, the sailor states, for fifteen weeks, during which he subsisted on oysters, such fish as he could catch, and some dried fish left by the Japanese in the deserted sheds. He was almost dead from privation and lack of proper food when the fishermen came. They treated him kindly, and took him to the American Consul at Yokohama, who sent him home. But for the timely arrival of the Japanese the man must have perished, and he describes his sensations of delight when at last he saw them approach, as overwhelming. If he had neglected the opportunity thus afforded him or refused the offer of the fishermen to take him off the island, he would have been despised as an imbecile, yet the offer of salvation comes to sinners of escape from a more perilous situation and is rejected (Heb. 12 : 25).

MARVELLOUS! MARVELLOUS!

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Thus saith the Lord of hosts; If it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the Lord of hosts."—Zechariah 7 : 6.

GOD sent His servant Zechariah with a promise that Jerusalem should be rebuilt, and that it should enjoy a time of great peace and prosperity. Instead of men being slain in battle in the prime of their days, old men and old women were to dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, "every man with his staff in his hand for very age;" and whereas war had often cut off the women and the children, the promise further added, "the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." Everything was to be prosperous in the land around, so as to bring plenty into the city, "For the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things." It was a sweet assurance, and it ought to have made them very happy, but it did not.

When this gracious promise came, it startled the people, for it seemed past belief. The unbelievers did not say point blank, "This promise is not true," but deep in their hearts they thought as much. It is not the general habit of unbelief among God's people to give a flat contradiction to His promises; we are hardly honest enough to our own thoughts to express them with deliberate plainness of speech; even unbelief loves to covering or other, that its naked deformity may not appear. Our reverence for the Lord will not permit us distinctly to give Him the lie; but it comes to much the same thing, for in our heart of hearts we deny the truthfulness of His Word.

The remnant of Israel said, "How can this thing be? In these days, in these troublous days, in these threatening days, how can Jerusalem be made to prosper? Former hopes have been disappointed; we see no better signs of the times, and doubtless if our hopes be now raised they will again be disappointed. How can the city rise from its ashes? We can hardly think it possible; at any rate, it will be marvellous, extremely difficult, exceedingly unlikely, indeed, impossible." They did not say at once, "It will not be;" but they said, "It will be a marvellous thing;" by which they meant that it was not in the least likely.

You who carry Bibles with you which have the marginal readings, will notice that in the margin there is the word "difficult," and the text may be read thus, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts; If it be difficult in your eyes, should it also be difficult in mine eyes?" This is the only instance in which the word "difficult" occurs in our version of the Bible, and in this case it is only to be found in the margin. There is too much of God in the Bible for difficulties to live in it. I should be very glad if I could always put the word "difficult" into the margin of my life, and never let it stand in the substance of it. I wish my faith would banish it. Difficulty does crop up now and then through unbelief; but where God manifests Himself, difficulty vanishes. Leave it in the margin, brother!

Leave it in the margin; let it not be read in the annals of your actual life. A brave self-reliance blots the word difficult out of its dictionary, and a full God-reliance may much more safely do so. If God be for us, all things can be accomplished. Things impossible with men are possible with God.

It certainly was a marvellous thing that Jerusalem, after having been so dreadfully destroyed, should again lift up its head and enjoy a little period of sunlight; but we are called upon to believe in even —wonders of a spiritual kind which are more difficult of belief than material miracles. I am going to talk about what to every intelligent and awakened mind will be the greatest wonder of all, namely, the possibility of our salvation by faith which is in Christ Jesus. Satan will assail you who are saved, and you who are seeking to be saved, and he will aim a blow at your faith. If he does not dare to tell you in his own native tongue of point blank lying that the promise which the Gospel makes to the believer is false, yet he will lead you to think it highly improbable, too good to be true, too wonderful ever to happen; in a word, he will make it appear marvellous in your eyes, and he will hint that it is incredible.

GREATER WONDERS

So this morning I am going, first, to speak upon carnal reasoning, how it runs; secondly, to offer a correction to that reasoning by pointing out an untruth which lies at the bottom of it; and, thirdly, I will try, in conclusion, to dwell upon the truth of the matter, and see if we cannot enjoy some right reasoning. O blessed Spirit of grace, teach our reason right reason at this hour, and make us to perceive all things in the light of truth!

I. Here we have before us a specimen of

CARNAL REASONING.

The Jews of those days said, "It is difficult; it will never be performed. It is marvellous in our eyes; it will never happen." This kind of speech comes from men as soon as they begin to think about their souls, and to desire the salvation of the Lord. We inform them in God's name that whosoever repents of sin and confesses it, and believes in Jesus Christ, shall receive immediate pardon; and this good news surprises them, as well it may.

Straightway the old serpent begins to hiss out a doubt, and they ask, "How can it be? Can a man receive in one moment forgiveness for fifty years of sin? How can his conscience be cleared by the simple act of believing in Christ? How can the record of a life of evil be blotted out at once?" Assuredly it does not seem probable to a troubled mind; reason decides that it must be very difficult; common-sense assents that it is a marvellous affair altogether, and the poor awakened hearts conclude that the promise of full, free, and present forgiveness cannot be true. Thus they push the promise of God concerning pardon on one side as a good thing which is quite past belief.

Then comes the blessing of renewal of heart, such as God speaks of in the covenant-promise, "A new heart also will I give them, and a right spirit will I put within them." Our hearer understands that upon his believing in Jesus he is born again, and becomes a new creature, with new likes and new hates, an entirely altered being; but understanding the promise is one thing, and believing it is another. A new heart the awakened one desires, but he considers it

TOO GREAT A MARVEL.

He knows that he cannot subdue his own stubborn will, nor conquer his own unruly passions; and therefore he concludes that the thing is improbable, and not to be looked for.

Even if the awakened soul proceeds as far as believing in the first two blessings, unbelief comes to him in another way, for this thief is sure to meet the traveller to Zion again and again. "Oh, but," says the tempted one, "how can I hope to persevere to the end? I shall be one of these days tempted so strongly that I shall be carried off my feet. What with indwelling sin and a cunning tempter, and a world full of evil, I cannot hope to endure to the end. I shall one day fall by the hand of the enemy. Do you assure me that the righteous shall hold on their way? Then it will be marvellous; it must be so difficult that I fear it is improbable, if not impossible." Thus unbelief pushes on one side another covenant blessing.

Further on there comes to the man who has been helped to persevere for a while the promise that he shall ultimately be presented faultless before the presence of God with exceeding joy; this promise is assailed in the same manner. We dwell upon the fact that it will be very marvellous; indeed, the more we think of it the more marvellous it becomes in our eyes; and, alas! unbelief leaps upon the back of our wonder, and we judge that the blessing can never be ours. Thus another promised blessing is thrown under the table.

I have known children of God in the time of their great trial, when they have been surrounded with afflictions, oppressed with poverty, and depressed in spirit, to become quite incredulous as to the possibility of deliverance. They ask, "How can God cause our bread to be given us and our water to be sure now? Can He bring us out of such sore trouble as this? When we see no passage through our straits we are sadly apt to conclude that God sees none. He has promised that with every trial He will make us a way of escape; but we doubt His Word. Like the unbelieving lord in the Book of Kings, we say, "If God would make windows in heaven, might such a thing be?" Unbelievers by this wicked reasoning are left in their spiritual death, while believers are hampered and sorely wounded. O accursed unbelief, this is thy false argument, "It is marvellous, and therefore it cannot be true!" We answer thee that because it is marvellous it is all the more likely to be true.

II. Secondly, we will now aim our arrows at in this carnal argument, which makes it all to be false; or, in other words, we will correct this reasoning.

First, let us note that when because the blessing promised is marvellous, we therefore doubt the promise of God concerning it, we must have forgotten God. "If it be marvellous in your eyes, saith the Lord of hosts, is it therefore marvellous in mine eyes?" God himself puts it so, and there is but one answer to the question.

To come to our one subject, that of your own salvation, you hear the promise of eternal life in Christ Jesus, and your mind replies, "It is marvellous, it is difficult." Do you not see that you are looking at it as if you had made the promise? From that standpoint it would be indeed difficult, even to impossibility. But

WHOSE PROMISE IS IT?

It is not yours, but God's. If you were to promise to give yourself eternal life, and to keep yourself to the end, and sanctify yourself perfectly, what a foolish person you would be to undertake what you could not possibly perform! But it is not your promise; it is God's promise. Is anything too hard for the Lord?

And, further, the error which vitiates the argument of carnal reason takes another shape. There is here, as far as the Lord is thought of at all, an underestimate of God. The Lord puts this very plainly in our text—"If it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes?" You are judging God as if He were like yourself. The deed of salvation is marvellous with you; but it is not strange with God, to whom it has been the great thought of eternity, toward which He causeth all things to move. Everything in affected by it; a trader goes to Africa, he takes with him a looking-glass, and you see the chiefs gather around, and with wonder they gaze upon their own pleasing countenances in the mirror. It is marvellous to them; it becomes the talk of the tribe; but that looking-glass is not marvellous to the trader who brought it there. A musical-box is set playing, and a whole village of negroes gather about it, unanimously believing that it must be at least a spirit, if not a God. To them it is a great marvel, and they expect the white man to marvel too, for they measure his capacity by their own; yet their wonderful thing is to an Englishman a mere simplicity. Shall we set it down for certain that what is a wonder to us is a wonder to God? This would be absurd.

When we begin to doubt whether God will love us to the end, is it not by our impatience? Is there not a calculating of God's immutability by our mutability? Because we change and grow weary, shall we fancy that the Lord also changes? Is there variableness and turning with the great Father of lights? Hath not the Lord declared, "I am God; I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed?"

Do you not see, dear friends, that if we begin to say that God's promise is so marvellous that it cannot be performed, we do the infinite God high dishonor? I tremble as I say that unbelief accuses the Lord of vain boasting. When a man promises you what he knows he cannot perform, what opinion do you form of him? You say at once, "Why, the man is a boaster; he is big at talking, but small at performing." Will you insinuate that of the Lord God? Has it come to this, that you dare criticise your Maker? Do you dare insinuate that the infinite Jehovah has promised to a sinner what He is incapable of giving him? He says, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved;" and you say, "No, I could not be saved." Does God, then, speak beyond His ability? Does He promise what He is not able to perform?

Or is it that you dream that God does not know His own strength? What! Is the Almighty ignorant? Is the only wise God unaware of His own power? Does He not know what He can do? If the Lord has given a promise to His people that He will keep them to the end, then He will keep them to the end without fail. That which is difficult with us is easy with Him. There is a radical mistake at the bottom of all this wicked, unbelieving reasoning—it leaves out the Lord altogether, or degrades Him below the glory of His Godhead.

III. We have reached the third division of our discourse, and here let us practise a little RIGHT REASONING.

I invite any here who are troubled with doubts about the promise of God to follow me in a few simple considerations. First, it is quite clear that for our salvation marvels must be wrought. It will be a wonder in all ages for any one of us to attain to glory; it will need the omnipotence of God to renew, preserve, and perfect us. It is a rule with regard to miracles that God is very economical with them. In the Romish Church you have miracles in abundance, such as they are; but they are for the most part needless parades of power. When St. Denis, after his head was cut off, picked it up in his hands and walked a thousand miles with it, the dear good man might as well have saved himself and his head the unsightly pilgrimage. When the blood of St. Januarius liquefies, or a Madonna winks, it may be interesting, but one does not see the necessity for either performance. The God of the Scriptures has no hand in such miracles; they are not of the same order as those which are wrought by His right hand.

Our Lord never uses a miracle where the same thing could be done by the ordinary processes of nature; but whenever a miracle is requisite, a miracle is forthcoming—there is no stint of power though there is no wasteful display of it. I argue, then, that if it is necessary for you to be saved in order that God's promise may be kept, you shall be saved; and if in order to this, marvels are needed, marvels will happen. The Lord reserves no strength when it is needful to expend it for the fulfilment of His promises; if omnipotence must make bare its arm, it shall be bared. The Lord led His people Israel to the Red Sea; perhaps if the Egyptians had not come up, it might have been possible to make rafts to ferry them across the gulf, and we are sure it would have been done if it had been the best way of achieving the Lord's design; but when the Egyptians were so close behind that you could hear the neighings of their horses, and almost feel the hot breath of their vengeful masters, then there remained no ordinary way for the people of God to escape, and lo! the mighty depths yawned before the tribes, and a road was opened through the heart of the sea that the people of God might pass through.

So it shall be with you; if to forgive your sin needs a miracle of grace, believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and the miracle of grace is done. If to change thy nature needs the miraculous power of the Holy Spirit, if thou believest in the Lord Jesus Christ, the Spirit waiteth to work that great change; nay, He has wrought the change, and thy faith is the evidence of it. If it shall need all the power of God to keep one of His children to the end, all that power shall be seen in Him; for though God worketh not miracles till they are needed, He is not slow to do so when the case demands them. He will shake earth and heaven to complete the salvation of His chosen. Therefore, if a deed of grace be marvellous in thine eyes, say to thyself, "Marvellous as it is, nothing short of it will avail, and therefore it shall be done."

A second little bit of reasoning may tend to comfort some of you, namely, that, after all,

MARVELLOUS THINGS ARE THE RULE

with God. I say not miracles, although it is difficult to draw the line between the ordinary processes of God's working and the extraordinary ones, for the ordinary are extraordinary, and His extraordinary deeds can hardly be more marvellous than His daily operations. All the works of God in creation are marvels. Take the telescope and search out the stars. Assuredly an "undevout astronomer is mad." When we perceive somewhat of the multitudes of worlds that God has made, their vast distances, the proportions of their bulk, the regularity of their orbits, and the rapidity of their motions, we discover that the great machinery of nature is ordered by infinite skill. "It is the Lord's doing," and it is marvellous in our eyes.

But now, if you have done with the telescope, please put it by, and let me lend you a microscope. Look at a butterfly from your garden; nay, you need not trouble to examine the whole creature, a portion of a broken wing will suffice for your astonishment. Here is a spider's eye! Are you not surprised? This is the petal of a flower—what amazing beauty! Take but a single portion of a minute blood-vessel, and study it awhile. I hear you say, "I never could have believed it; this glass reveals to me such wonders that I am utterly astounded." God is as great in the little as in the great; He is God everywhere. If a man carefully fashions a needle it appears to be exquisitely smooth and polished. Ah! it is only bright because your eye is dim. Put it under the glass. It is transformed into a rough bar of iron. No works of man will bear to be examined with a microscope; but you may search the Lord's work with the utmost care. The commonest, plainest, simplest, most ordinary creation of God is perfect. Since, then, all nature teems with marvels, why put aside a promise of God because it involves a marvel? Is such conduct reasonable?

Follow me yet a little further, when I say that you must be prepared to abandon altogether the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ if you make it a rule to disbelieve the marvellous. The greatest marvel that I ever heard of is this—"Great is the mystery of godliness; God was manifest in the flesh." How the infinite could become one with the finite, so that the babe at Bethlehem should be the Mighty God, I cannot tell, and I think you cannot. Are you prepared to forego the incarnation of Christ? For if you are not, you must not refuse to believe in any act of God because it is marvellous, for it cannot be more marvellous than God in human flesh.

Think again: it is a cardinal doctrine of Christianity that again; that at the sounding of the trump of God they that are in their graves will rise to be judged in their bodies. Is not this a marvel? Stand in a cemetery, and ask the question, "Can these dry bones live?" Do you believe in the resurrection? Then you must never set aside any promise of God because it involves a marvel. You also believe, according to the word of the Lord, that this world will one day be the home of God's glory, for there shall be new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, and the travail of the groaning creation shall come to an end, and this world shall be made anew a temple for the Lord. What an extraordinary thing this will be! yet you believe it. Do not therefore ever doubt a single promise that God makes either to saint or sinner because it contains a marvel.

Yet, again, I want you to follow me in another thought, namely, that greater marvels have been already wrought than any which your salvation and mine will henceforth involve. Brothers, if it had been whispered to some one of us that God would take upon Himself human form and dwell among men, we should have looked much astonished; but if the prophet had added, "In that form He will be despised and spit upon, and hung up to die a felon's death, because He will bear the sin of man, which will be laid upon His perfect person, so that He will be made a curse for us," we should have said, "No, that cannot be." Beloved, it has been; atonement has been accomplished. The renewal of our nature, and the forgiveness of our sin, are but little things compared with what Christ has already done. That He should now save His people seems to me not at all extraordinary; it would be more extraordinary that He should die, and not save those for whom He died. Having paid the ransom price for His heritage, it is but a natural consequence that it should be set free.

Lastly, let me say, whenever you have any doubts and fears, do turn away your mind from the thing that is promised to the faithful Promiser. We want larger ideas of God altogether. If we had them we should find it easy to believe His Word. I remember when a boy being taken to see the residence of one of our nobility, and the good friend who took me noticed my astonishment at the largeness of the house. I was amazed at it, having never seen anything like it, and so I said, "What a house for a man to live in!" "Bless you, boy," said he, "this is only the kitchen!" I was only looking at the servants' apartments, and was astonished at the grandeur thereof; but the mansion itself was a far nobler affair. Oftentimes when you see what the Lord has done, you are ready to cry out, "How can all this be? His goodness, His mercy, is it as great as this?" Rest assured that you have only seen a little of His goodness, as it were the kitchen of His great house; you have not seen the palace of the Most High, where He reveals His full power and splendor.

You know

THE STORY OF THE WARRIOR,

who, having led his men into a difficult position, went round at night to their tents. He said to himself, "If they are all in good heart we shall fight well to-morrow, but certainly this defile needs all our valor; I should like to know the spirit of my men." Going round the camp secretly, he heard in a tent some half-dozen soldiers conversing, and one of them above the rest was saying, "I think our general has made a great mistake this time; look at the enemy; they have so many cavalry, so many infantry and guns, and so forth." He added up all the force of the enemy, and another soldier chimed in, "What do you suppose our strength to be?" So the other calculated—so many footmen, so many horsemen, so many artillerymen, and so on. He was just going to total it up, and make a very small concern of the whole, when the general drew aside the canvas of the tent and said, "And pray, my man, how many do you count me for?" Did all the general's skill, and valor, and renown count for nothing? He who had won so many fights could he not win again? Just so the Lord Jesus Christ, whenever we begin summing up our strength, or rather our weakness, seems to appear and say, "How many do you count me for?" O sirs! you have not counted the Lord Jesus at the millionth part of what He is; nay, the firmest believer here has not yet reached the trailing skirts of the garments of divine omnipotence. Let us enlarge our minds. Come, blessed Spirit, reveal Christ in us, and let us thus know more of God, and trust Him better, and let nothing be unbelievingly marvellous in our eyes, since nothing can be too hard for the Lord. God bless you. Amen.

MISS CARRIE F. JUDD.

EXTRACTS have frequently appeared in this journal from Triumphs of Faith, a monthly magazine, edited by Miss Carrie F. Judd. This week we publish a portrait of that lady, which appears on the next page. Miss Judd has for some time devoted all her efforts to the guidance and encouragement of suffering believers, whom she endeavors to lead to placing all their faith and hope for their bodies as well as their souls in the Saviour. She was prompted to undertake this work by her own remarkable recovery from a long and painful illness. The narrative of her restoration to health is best told in her own words. She says:

"On the sixth of January, 1877, after a gradual decline in health, I was prostrated with an attack of fever, proceeding from my spine, the result, probably, of a severe fall on a stone sidewalk several months before. The fever was soon subdued, but my disease grew into settled spinal difficulty, and from the inflammation of the spinal nerves proceeded a most distressing hyper-acuteness, called hyperæsthesia. This extended to all my large joints; and my hips, knees, and ankles could not be touched even by myself, on account of their sensitiveness. The disease increased until the nerves in the joints were so unnaturally alive that it was as if they had been laid bare, and it seemed to me as though nothing less than spasms would be the immediate result were they touched. The vibrating of these sensitive nerves, occasioned by the tiniest jar or noise in the room, was something indescribably dreadful.

"For all but the first two months of my illness, extreme helplessness as well as suffering made my lot almost unendurable. For more than two years, turning over alone or moving myself a particle in bed was simply an impossibility. Every move was made for me with the greatest care. I suffered intensely with my head; the violent, tearing pain, the terrible sense of weight, and the extreme sensitiveness made a soft, small pillow feel like a block of stone, the pressure of which was crushing my brain to atoms. Much of the time we were obliged to exclude from the room all excepting those who had the care of me.

"For eleven months I could not sit up at all, but in the spring of 1878 I improved slowly, and could be lifted into a chair for a little while each day. I was more comfortable until July, but I was not by my greatest exertions able to help myself at all. The only way in which I could be shoved from the bed to the chair was by being lifted under my arms, as I could endure no pressure on my spine.

"The very warm weather at that time, and my making attempts to help myself when in such a weak condition, caused a sudden and violent relapse, and, in spite of everything that could be done for me, I continued to fail. I rallied a little in the autumn, but only temporarily, and in February, 1879, the doctors pronounced my disease to be blood consumption; I was emaciated to a shadow, and my largest veins looked like mere threads. My pulse could scarcely be found, and I was not expected to live from one day to the next. Everything that the most skilful physicians could do for me had been done; only the 'Great Physician' could restore me by His almighty power."

About this time Miss Judd's attention was directed to the cures wrought by Christ in answer to prayer, some of which were of cases similar to her own. She made inquiry about those cases, and wrote to Mrs. Edward Mix, of Wolcottville, Conn., Dr. Cullis, and others. In replying to her, Mrs. Mix said:

"I can encourage you, by the Word of God, that 'according to your faith' so be it unto you; and, beside, you have this promise, 'The prayer of faith shall save the sick.' When you receive this letter I want you to begin to pray for faith, and Wednesday afternoon the female prayer-meeting is at our house. We will make you a subject of prayer, between the hours of three and four. I want you to pray for yourself, and pray believing, and then act faith. It makes no difference how you feel, but get right out of bed and begin to walk by faith. Strength will come, disease will depart, and you will be made whole."

Miss Judd says: "Is it any wonder that in my utter weakness, my confirmed helplessness, and, above all, my lack of faith, that I was tempted to smile unbelievingly at the words 'get right out of bed and begin to walk by faith?' My conscience reproved me for my unbelief, and I began to pray for an increase of faith. At the hour appointed by Mrs. Mix, members of our own family also offered up prayer, though not in my room. Just before this, I seemed to have no power whatever to grasp the promise. Terrible darkness and powerful temptations from Satan rose to obscure even the little faith I had, but suddenly, my soul was filled with a childlike peace and confidence, different from anything I had ever before experienced.

"There was no excitement, but, without the least fear or hesitation, I turned over and rose alone, for the first time in over two years. My nurse, Mrs. H., who had taken care of me for nearly a year, was greatly affected, and began praising God for His wonderful power and mercy. Directly after, with a little support from my nurse, I walked a few steps to my chair. During that same hour, a decided change was perceptible in my color, circulation and pulse, and I could talk aloud with ease. In about three weeks I could walk around the room without even having any one near me; in four weeks I walked down-stairs with a little assistance; I walked very steadily from the first, and my joints, which had been weakened by the hyperæsthesia, grew strong and firm. My muscles filled out very rapidly, but I suffered nothing from aching or lameness, even after I commenced going up and down-stairs.

"I will mention here, that it was especially noticeable, during my healing, that whenever I made any extra exertion of my own, suddenly, and without the least apparent cause, my strength would fail me. It was soon revealed to me, that I was simply to look to the Lord for improvement; that as He had begun the work, He would carry it on without any strivings on my part.

"My gain in flesh and strength was rapid, and my friends say that I am now looking better than ever before.

"I wish to add that Dr. Charles Cullis, of Boston, Mass., whose faith-works and faith-cures are so widely known, kindly added his prayers for my complete recovery."

AN IRISH LANDOWNER'S DEPARTURE.

(See Illustration.)

THE sketch on this page depicts a scene very familiar in Ireland during the past three years. The landholder having received threatening letters, unable to collect the rents from his tenants, and having been shot at once or twice, applies to the government for special police protection. A semi-military guard is supplied to him, and for a time he takes his daily walks and rides guarded by armed men, who also watch his house at night. Such a life of constant danger, annoyance and dread soon becomes unendurable, and he finally resolves to leave the country until more peaceful times, preferring poverty and discomfort in some English or continental city to the luxury and state of his ancestral home with its attendant perils. The news of his departure is soon spread, and the tenants and their wives and children assemble to see him drive away. They are no pleasant sounds that he hears as he mounts his car to be driven to the railroad depot. Taunts, jeers and muttered curses come from lips from which but a few years ago only respectful words proceeded in his presence. The obsequious laborer and his courteous wife now yell out their hatred as he departs, and he leaves the home of his fathers amid the execrations of the people he has known from boyhood. Whether he will ever return he knows not, but he counts himself happy to have escaped with his life.

It often happens that the landlord's conscience does not reproach him with cruelty or oppression. He may have been a good landlord as landlords go. He is certainly no worse than his father or grandfather or than other landlords his neighbors are. But it has fallen to him, as in the course of history it has fallen to others, to suffer for the sins of his fathers. They lived careless of the condition of the poor around them. They never sought to benefit them by education or religious training. They made no effort to train them in habits of industry and thrift, or to help them by small expenditures to make the best of the land. They asked for and received the highest rents they could obtain, and ignored the misery that abounded around them. The tenant could not drain the land nor make improvements. If he did so the landowner noticing that his crops were better and his cattle fatter would raise his rent and he would be in a worse state than before he sank his money in improving another man's property. The tenants became hopeless and apathetic. They lost their energy. What wonder, in such a state, with bitter poverty in the present and no hope for the future, that the Irish farmers and laborers listened willingly to designing men, who promised them deliverance.

If years ago the Irish landowner had established schools, assisted in the organization of savings banks and benefit societies, and had endeavored to raise the people out of the ignorance and superstition in which they were sunk under the fostering care of the Romish priests, their sons would not now be exiled from their estates and asking in vain for unpaid rents. They lived in ease and luxury, careless of the fact that the poor around them were drifting downward financially, intellectually and morally. The landowner thought it was no concern of his, when he thought of it at all —which was seldom. And they continued to drift downward. It is useless now to tell the people that Davitt and Healy and Sexton and others are deceiving them, and are merely making tools of them for their own purposes. The people are too ignorant to discriminate or to realize the result of what they do. The ignorance which grew up unheeded in the past is deplored now that it is bearing its inevitable fruit. The man who attends seditious meetings and joins in marauding exploits would have been an industrious, prosperous farmer if his father could have obtained from the landlord the assistance in improving his land which was his due. The sins of the fathers in Ireland are, according to God's warning, required of their children, and the sour grapes eaten by a former generation are setting on edge the teeth of their descendants, the landowners of this generation.

"Full of his own troubles, John Bennett did not heed the goat."

THE BAKER'S DISAPPOINTMENT DISPELLED.

A LONG, lonely road on a cold winter's day. The sun is shining, but its rays seem to have been frozen so that they give light but no warmth. No living thing can be seen upon it, though the eye can take in a full mile of its course. Presently a goat pushes itself through the trees on one side of the road and snuffles lazily among the dead leaves and withered grasses.

Presently the tramp of a horse and the sound of wheels is heard, and a baker's cart comes in sight. The goat looks up expectantly, but the baker drives on. The goat, as if in protest, follows, raising its head and sniffing the smell of the newly-baked bread. Suddenly the man stops, raises the cover of his cart, and taking out a strip of crust throws it to the goat, saying as he did so, "It is not your fault, you ought not to suffer for it."

John Bennett had driven over that road every day for three years, and since he first saw the goat a year ago he had every morning given it a piece of bread. But this morning his heart was burdened. Things were going wrong with his business, and he knew that when he reached his home he must meet a creditor he had promised to pay, but could not. He had hoped to collect a bill during his journey which would have made up the sum required, but he had not been paid. He had learned the reason of the failure, too. One of the men in the employ of the customer who owed him explained it. The customer arrived home from market last night intoxicated, and without his pocketbook, which contained a considerable sum, out of which the baker's account should have been paid.

It was a sore disappointment, and John Bennett was in no hurry to continue his journey, but sat moodily watching the animal crunching its meal. As he did so he seemed to gain fresh light. "God feedeth them," were the words that came into his mind, and he remembered Christ's injunction, "Take no thought for the morrow." "I can trust Him," he said at last. "I am trusting Him for my soul; I can surely trust Him for my body and the provision for my family." His face cleared of its clouds, and shaking the reins as a signal to his horse to go on, he looked around at the goat, and said cheerily, "Good-by, old fellow, you have taught me a lesson."

The goat had finished his bread and had found something else, which it was industriously chewing. The baker looked at it a moment, and was quickly off his cart and by the goat's side. It was a pocketbook that the goat was trying to masticate, and inscribed upon it were the name and address of his customer, whose heedlessness had caused all his trouble. Very joyfully he turned his horse's head and went on his pleasant mission to restore the lost property. Returning half an hour afterward along the same road with the money safely in his pocket wherewith to satisfy his creditor, his heart throbbed with thankfulness to God, who in his extremity had made for him a way of escape. "Yes," he said, "it is true, 'Blessed are all they who put their trust in Him.'"

POVERTY'S PREY.

A SERIAL STORY.

Mrs. Fell Gives Up the Struggle.

MRS. FELL had heard of other women having their wedding-rings changed, and never being able to right themselves; and she could not bear to think of some other woman, happier than herself, wearing it as her wedding-ring, and prizing it as she had done. A thousand dim memories and inarticulate thoughts centred in the lost ring—none the less real, perhaps, because the poor widow was only an ignorant woman, and could not express her feelings in language. She lay moaning in utter hopelessness and helplessness, knowing too well it was lost forever. Before even they could expect David back, Roger ran in, breathless and stammering. The candle was still burning, and they could see his agitated face and his excited gestures plainly.

"He's bein' took to jail again!" he exclaimed in broken sentences. "I see him all along. He up and at old Quirk as brave as a bull-dog. He had him down on the ground in no time. He'd said as you was a thief and a drunkard, and worse; and David couldn't stand it. I'd ha' had a cut at him too; but he had him down on his back in a moment's time, and he fought for you like a good un!"

"But where is he?" gasped the mother, as her eyes, glistening with terror, turned toward the door, where Bess was standing, as though waiting to let David in, and close it safely after him.

"He's took to jail, you know," answered Roger, with an oath such as he had learned when he could first speak. "There was a bobby up, afore I could give him warnin', pushin' through everybody; and old Quirk gave him in charge, and they walked him off to the station, to be shut up all night till to-morrow mornin'. And he shouted, 'Somebody tell my mother what's befell me!' And he looked straight at me, and I came off at wunst. Perhaps they'll let him go free in the mornin'!"

But even Roger's unaccustomed eyes could see the deathlike pallor and change that came over the face of David's mother, as she heard what he had to say. She uttered no word or cry, but sank down again on her miserable death-bed, and turned her despairing face to the wall. Bess sent away Roger, and, carefully putting out the candle, crept on to the sacking beside her, and, laying her arm gently across her, spoke hopefully of David being released, and Quirk punished, as soon as the truth was known. But Mrs. Fell was at last broken-hearted, and answered not a word even to little Bess, who fell asleep at last, crying softly to herself.

Who can tell how long the hours of that night were? Darkness without, and within the utter blackness of despair! The craving hunger of disease, and the soul's hunger after the welfare of her children! The chilly dew of death, and the icy death-blow dealt to every lingering hope for them! When Bess awoke and bestirred herself early in the morning, her mother still lay speechless, and she dared not leave her. Euclid started on his day's work alone. There was no one she could ask for help; so she set about her little tasks of lighting a handful of fire, and making a cup of tea for her mother, which she could not persuade her to touch. It was a dark and dreary winter's morning—so dark where she was living, that she could scarcely see her mother's face.

The afternoon was fast fading into night—another night of misery and despair—when Roger stole softly in, and crept gently up to the side of the bed where David's mother lay. Bess was sitting by her, holding her hand closely, as if she could thus keep her in the world where her lot had been so hard. She had not spoken yet, and had scarcely moved, since Roger had brought his fatal tidings the night before. Now, when her ear caught the sound of his low, awe-struck voice, she opened her eyes once more, and fastened them upon him. He stooped down, and spoke to her in a sorrowful whisper.

"He's got three months agen," he said. "Never mind! everybody gets into jail some time o' their lives!"

Mrs. Fell's lips moved tremulously, as the eyelids closed slowly over her dim eyes, which were losing sight of Bess, though she was leaning over her, and calling, "Mother!"

"He might ha' been a good man like his father!" she moaned with her dying breath.

A parish coffin and a pauper's grave were all the country had to give to the dead mother, whose son, in the ignorance and recklessness of boyhood, had broken the laws twice, and been each time visited with a harsh penalty. "That servant which knew his lord's will, and did it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes." There is Christ's rule. Do we, who sometimes pride ourselves as being the most Christian nation on the face of the earth, abide by that rule?

The mother was buried; and what was to become of Bess? No one was bound to take any care of her. She was old enough to see after herself. There was the poorhouse open to her, if she chose to apply for admission; but, if she entered it, it would be to be sent out to service, as a poorhouse girl, in the course of a few weeks or months, untrained and untaught, fit only for the miserable drudgery of the lowest service. There was not strength enough in her slight, ill-fed frame to enable her to keep body and soul together at laundry-work, which was the only work she knew anything of. There was no home, however wretched, to give her shelter, if she continued to sell water-cresses in the streets. True, Blackett offered her the refuge of his lodgings, and Roger urged her eagerly to avail herself of his father's kindness; but Bess shrank away with terror from the mere thought of it. Blackett had been the object of her daily dread ever since her childhood, and no change in his manner toward her could inspire her with confidence.

When she came back from following her mother's coffin to its pauper's grave, she stole past Blackett's door into the empty room beyond, and sat down, worn out with grief and weariness, on the bedstead where her mother's corpse had been lying for the last three days. She had lived in the room alone with it, and she felt more lonely now that it was gone. Silent and motionless as it had been, with its half-closed eyelids, and the ashy whiteness of its face gleaming even in the dusk, it had been a companion to her, and she had not been afraid of it. Now it was gone, she was indeed alone.

There was not a single article of furniture left in the room, except this low, rough pallet-bedstead, with the dingy sacking, bare of bed and bedclothes. Everything else was gone. There was now no candlestick left, no teapot or cup, no flat-iron or poker—not one of the small household goods of the poor. Bess had carried all the few possessions left to her, in a miscellaneous lot, to get what she could for them at the marine stores. She would have carried off the bedsteads if they had not been too heavy for her, or if her mother's corpse had not been lying there.

Euclid, her only friend, had not been near her these three days. The truth is that the poor old man was passing through a great and severe struggle, and it was not over yet. He had grown in a measure fond of Bess, and his heart was grieved to the very core for her. But what was he to do? he continually asked himself. What could a poor old man like him do? He was terribly afraid of taking any additional weight upon his overburdened shoulders, especially now he was in sight of the goal. For the last year or two, as he felt the infirmities of age growing heavier, an unspeakable dread lodged in his inmost soul, lest, after all, he should fail in his life's aim. Could he endure to see Victoria buried as Mrs. Fell was?

He had lurked in a dark corner of the staircase, and watched the rough and reckless way in which the rude, slight box, that could hardly be called a coffin, was bundled out of the house, and carried off along the street, followed by Bess alone as the only mourner for the dead. It had given a sharp and poignant prick to his hidden fears. How could he burden himself with the care of Bess while there was any chance of such an ending to his career, or, worse still, to Victoria's? If Victoria had been buried in her own coffin, as his wife and the other children had been, he might have taken up with Bess. But she seemed no nearer the grave than at the beginning of the winter; her health, or rather her complaint, whatever it was, remained stationary. No; he must not sacrifice Victoria to Bess.

Poor Bess! But as she was sitting alone in the gathering twilight, bewildered with her sorrow, she heard the door softly opened, and as softly closed again. It was Victoria who had come in, after crawling feebly down the long flights of stairs, which she had mounted four months ago, in the autumn, for the last time as she thought. She could not speak yet, and she sat down breathless and silent beside the desolate girl. There was a mournful stillness as of death in the room, though all around were echoing the busy, jarring noises of common life.

"I don't know much," said Victoria at last in her low, weak voice; "but I've dreams sometimes, lyin' up there alone all day, and I seem to see quite plain some place where the sun is always shinin', and folks are happy, and there mother is. I saw it last night, betwixt sleepin' and wakin', as plain as I see you. And your mother was there, Bess; and some one, I couldn't see his face, was leadin' her to where the sun was warm and bright, and choosin' a good place for her to rest in; and he looked as if he was watchin' for any litttle bit o' stone in the way, for fear she'd hurt her feet, like we might do wi' a little, little child, just learnin' to go alone. And, O Bess! your mother turned so as I could see her face; and it was very pale, but very peaceful. There wasn't any more pain in it."

"Is it true?" sobbed Bess.

"I don't know much," repeated Victoria. "I never went to school; for father couldn't pay for my schoolin'. He'd have done it gladly; but water-cresses isn't much for a family to live on, and die on. But I think it must be true; or how could I see it? I told father what I'm tellin' you; and I said to him, 'Father, it don't matter very much about bein' buried in our own coffins, if we get to a place like that after all.'"

"And what did he say?" asked Bess.

"He made a noise like 'Umph!' and went off," answered Victoria.

"If there was only somebody to tell us true!" sobbed Bess again.

"Father won't let the missioners come to see me," went on Victoria. "He says they teaches cants to get coals, and he'd as soon get his coals from the parish. There was a sister o' mother's as was converted, and they put her into what they call a report; and father was that ashamed! None on us had ever been in such a thing. We never had nothing to do with her, so as I don't know if it's true. Father says as he likes to see religion, and he don't see nothink he could call religion in her, or in most folks as are converted and put in the report. I never knew rightly what converted means," said Victoria, sighing sadly, and speaking in a low voice, as if to herself.

But Bess was thinking no longer of Victoria's dreams. Her thoughts had gone in again, brooding over their own sorrows; and she moaned with a very deep and bitter moaning.

"Oh, what shall I do?" she cried. "What shall I do?"

"I came to fetch you up-stairs to live with us," answered Victoria very softly. "Father'll be glad enough when it's done. You'd be as good as another daughter to father if I was gone; and nobody knows how soon that may be. He's a bit shy and queer just now; but that'll be gone when it's all settled. You shall help me up-stairs again, Bess; and when father comes he'll get somebody to help him carry these bedsteads up for you and me to sleep on. It'll be better for me than sleepin' on the floor, you know."

When Euclid reached home an hour later, he paused before going up-stairs, and knocked at the door of Mrs. Fell's room; but there was no answer. He tried to open it; but it was locked. Where could little Bess be? he asked himself in sudden terror. She must be come back from the funeral by this time. Was it possible that she had taken shelter with Blackett? The old man's withered face tingled, and his frame shook as with ague, as the thought flashed across him. Whose fault would it be? It was he who had forsaken Bess in her misery, the fatherless, motherless, brotherless girl.

He stood outside the closed and locked door, thinking of her light footstep and pretty face tripping along at his side every morning for the last two months. He had not known how closely she had crept to his heart until now the dread was beating against him that she was gone to Blackett. The old man's gray and grim face grew grayer and grimmer. It would be a hard thing, no doubt, to follow Victoria to the grave in a pauper's coffin; but, oh, it would be even harder to see Bess flaunting about the streets a lost and wretched creature. His conscience smote him sharply. And now what must he do? What did he dare to do? It would be like braving a lion in his den to face Blackett at his own fireside. Yet probably Bess was there.

"God help this old tongue o' mine!" said Euclid half aloud, as, after some minutes of hesitation, he turned with desperate courage to knock at Blackett's door.

"Come in!" shouted Blackett with a surly snarl.

Euclid opened the door, and stood humbly on the threshold. It was a room less bare, but more squalid with dirt, than any other in the house. The woman who had been the mother of Blackett's three sons had long ago disappeared; and what little cleanliness and comfort had once been known there had gone with her. The air was stifling with the fumes of tobacco and spirits, and Blackett was smoking over a fireplace choked up with ashes. Roger, who was bound hand and foot with strong cords, had rolled himself out of easy reach of his father's kicks, and was lying in a corner with an expression of terror and hatred on his face. But Bess was nowhere to be seen.

"Come in, and shut the door!" shouted Blackett.

"Mr. Blackett," said Euclid, shutting the door behind him, with the long-sleeping courage of manhood stirring in his old heart, "have you seen aught of Mrs. Fell's little Bess?"

"Ay, have I!" growled Blackett with an oath. "Victoria's been and fetched her up to your rat-hole; and now I give you fair warning, old fellow, if you go to harbor that girl, I'll make this place too hot for you. I'll keep a eye on you going out and coming in, and you'll repent it sore. Get out o' this like a shot, or I'll begin on it at once."

But Euclid was off like a shot before Blackett had finished his threats, and was mounting to his garret with a suddenly gladdened heart. "Thank God! thank God!" he repeated to himself, step after step up the long staircase. He had hardly heeded Blackett's menaces, though they lodged themselves unconsciously in his mind, and came back to his memory when his first gladness was over. Bess had fallen asleep for sorrow on Victoria's bed; and he stooped over her, and laid his hard brown hand gently on her head, as if to welcome her to her new home. "God bless her!" he murmured.

"I sha'n't care if you can't bury me in my own coffin," whispered Victoria, "not a bit."

"We'll see about that, Victoria, my dear," he answered with tears of mingled joy and fear glittering in his eyes. "Please God, He'll let me do as much as that!"

DAVID'S ENEMY—SAUL

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 2, 1 Sam. 18 : 1-16. Golden Text, ver. 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

David's Modesty—Former Services to Saul Ignored—David as a Type of Christ—Jonathan's Love—His Typical Gift—The Testing Process—Tried by Popularity and Place—By the Jealousy of the King—Return of Saul's Malady—It Becomes Homicidal—David in Peril—His Rank Reduced—Saul Conspires his Death—The Lord with David.

SAUL'S mental affliction affected his memory. When he saw David go forth against the Philistines, he asked Abner, the captain of his host, "Whose son is this youth?" It was not to the credit of Abner that a former sub-officer in the army which he commanded should have shown such courage, while he, the general in command, had been intimidated in common with the remainder of the children of Israel; therefore he denied any knowledge of him. But when Saul's former armor-bearer had far outdone Abner and he returned victorious with the Philistine's head in his hand, Saul, who had insisted on his inquiring whose son the stripling was, now asked David himself, who, instead of attempting to recall himself to Saul, only said, "I am the son of thy servant, Jesse, the Bethlehemite." Whether this was the attraction, we know not, but this we are told, that "when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David; and Jonathan loved him as his own soul." It seems strange that no reference should have been made by Saul or any of his people to their former acquaintance with David; but if we look at the typical teaching (David as the type of Christ) the similitude is indeed apt. How many of us have made use of Jesus in an emergency. He has driven away the evil spirit which troubled us at the time, whether temper, pride, envy, impurity, or whatever it was; yet as God's great present Deliverer we did not know Him.

Saul took him that day, and would let him go no more home to his father's house; but Saul and David could not long live together, just as self and Christ the life of the one is the death of the other, they cannot coexist. But Jonathan [whom Jehovah gave] made a covenant with David, "because he loved him as his own soul." Jonathan is a beautiful type of the true disciple, called to be the bride of Christ. He did not make a covenant with David in order to obtain his love, but as the result of his love to him. And the expression of his love was most precious; Jonathan, the heir apparent to the throne, "stripped himself of the robe which was upon him, the princely robe, and gave it to David; it was not houses and lands, money, cattle, and things outside himself; he placed David by his gifts in his own very place, he gave him "his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle." There was but one sword between Jonathan and David now, and David was trusted by the young prince to be his defender. What a lovely type of the love which our beloved God permits us to offer Him! He permits us to strip ourselves, He takes the robe, the only one we have to give, the filthy garments of our own righteousness, and our own sins (Isa. 64 : 6; Zech. 3 : 3); and He takes this robe as His, with all our other garments. He takes our sword, our bow, our girdle, that with the sin He may also take the responsibility of defending us for the future; thus on our part it is absolute surrender and absolute confidence; on His part He takes us and all we are and have, making Himself responsible; we nothing, He everything!

CANNOT COME TO TERMS—

DAVID'S TESTING.

David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, and behaved himself wisely, and Saul set him over the men of war; and he was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also in the sight of Saul's servants. Thus God was giving His own anointed king to become a public character and to be used to the ways of a court. But he must yet be much tried, for God always puts His own chosen instruments of blessing very specially to the test. A grand day of triumph was held to celebrate the great victory which the people had gained over the Philistines. One part of the proceedings was to be singing and dancing by the women out of all the cities of Israel, who should make and sing songs of triumph on the occasion, with various instruments of music. But the burden of every chorus was, "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands." This was too much for a man like Saul, who was full of self; he was quite ready to patronize David and to hold him in high esteem at court—it was only politic to do so, he himself would have lost ground with the people if he had not done so—but he never dreamed of any superiority being ascribed to David. The evil spirit which oppressed him took now the form of the most to keep his position with the people was the point about which he was most tenacious. When Samuel was sent to him with the message that God had rejected him, Saul had said, "I have sinned, yet honor me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people and before Israel." This was the same spirit which prompted him now to say in his wrath, "They have ascribed unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed but thousands; and what can he have more but the kingdom?" A man who is possessed with self does not inquire about anything "What is the truth?" but only, "How will it touch me?" Saul did not reflect that it was David in very deed who had been used of God to turn the fear and trembling of Saul and the children of Israel into a glorious victory over their enemies. What Saul saw only was that he was king, and another was being preferred before him, and this was all the more bitter because he knew that God had declared it should be so. Oh, how unreasonable is the heart of man when self is interested! Saul could see only Saul; Saul was depreciated, and thus he was angry. Jealousy is the rage of man (Prov. 6 : 34). "And Saul eyed David from that day and forward."

Things could not long remain as they were. Saul, the man living for self, and David, the man living for God, could not long dwell together without coming into collision. On the very morrow after the day of triumph "the evil spirit from God came upon Saul, and he prophesied in the midst of the house;" David, although now filling quite a different position at court, yet did as in former times, he "played with his hands;" but this time the evil spirit was not to be so easily subdued. Jealousy is cruel as the grave; the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame" (Cant. 8 : 6). So fearfully was Saul under the power of this demon of jealousy that he attempted to murder David by casting a javelin at him. But the man whom God had chosen to be ruler over His people could not be slain by man except God permitted. Thus it happened that "Saul was not David of Saul, "because the Lord was with him and was departed from Saul." The very sight of David became unbearable to Saul, and thus he removed him from him, and "made him his captain over a thousand." Oh, how blessed was God's care for David; in danger of his life every moment, yet perfectly safe because in God's keeping.

David did not resist the change which Saul made in his government appointment. From being set over the men of war, an appointment almost equal to that of Abner, he was removed from court, and set over only a thousand men. But God permitted it, and David saw God's hand in all which happened to him, "He leadeth me" (Ps. 23 : 2) was his testimony to the care of his good Shepherd, whether to promotion or deposition, "He leadeth me." Thus, instead of being offended, or occupied with any wrong done to him by Saul, David counted on the care of his Shepherd over him, and said in his heart, "I shall not want" (Ps. 23 : 1). Unoccupied with himself, he could give all his attention to the work which was intrusted to him, and he "behaved himself wisely in all his ways; and the Lord was with him." Saul was not quite prepared for David behaving himself wisely; had he been so dealt with, he could not have acted so, and he was the more afraid of him. Deeds are more powerful than words; if by the grace of God we are enable to take everything pleasant or unpleasant, just or unjust, from the hand of God with joy and gratitude, those who would injure us are baffled; and not only so, they have a feeling of fear also, a consciousness of some power which they know not how to meet; without being aware of it

THEY FEEL THE REALITY OF GOD.

One thought possessed Saul from this time; it was to destroy David. Love, respect, honor, esteem—all which Saul coveted from the people—was bestowed upon David, and as long as he stood in the way, Saul felt he could not regain them for himself. An expedient suggested itself; many fell in battle, why not David? So he called him, and offered him his elder daughter in marriage, if he would be valiant for him, and "fight the Lord's battles;" the wretched man still made use of religious language to cover his murderous intentions, while he wished that David might be slain in battle. But when Merab should have been given to David, the king gave her to Adriel the Meholathite. But Michal, Saul's younger daughter, loved David. It came to the king's ears, and he thought how to make use of this for David's ruin. Like all men who have no moral courage, he made use of a third party. He called his servants and sent them to commune with David secretly, and to tell him that which was a grievous untruth, "Behold the king hath great delight in thee," as well as that which was true, "and all his servants love thee; now therefore be

THE KING'S SON-IN-LAW."

David's answer was in accordance with all his conduct. "Seemeth it to you a light thing to be a king's son-in-law, seeing that I am a poor man, and lightly esteemed?" The messengers who went between the king and David retailed this to the king, and brought back the message that Saul's only condition was that one hundred Philistines should be slain by David. Saul calculated that David would fall by the hands of the Philistines, but he did not take God into his reckoning, he did not compute that he had David's God as well as David to deal with. When David returned to him with solid proof of having slain two hundred Philistines, and yet was himself unhurt, Saul could not withdraw his promise, and so gave Michal his daughter to be David's wife. The conviction that the Lord was with David could not escape Saul, he knew that he knew, too, that his contention with David was against great odds on this account, yet he did not humble himself, but was increasingly afraid of him, "and became David's enemy continually." God has given the sceptre to Christ, not to self, and all attempts to overthrow the power of God are more than futile. Saul's plans and expedients to obtain his own way were all overcome, but David, who trusted in the Lord and was subject to Him at all times, succeeded in everything which he undertook; let us follow him.

THE LORD WAS WITH HIM,

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Attempt to Assassinate M. Ferry, the French Premier, was made on November 16th. Several efforts were made in the course of the day by a young man of respectable appearance and courteous manners to obtain a personal interview with the premier, but he was informed on each occasion that he could not be admitted without a letter of appointment. At length he contrived to pass several of the ushers, and following a deputation passed into the interior of the government building, but he mistook his way, and returned to the outer court, where he was ordered to leave. As he refused, the attendants proceeded to eject him, when he drew a loaded revolver, proclaiming his determination to kill the premier before he left. He was overpowered and disarmed. The news reports say that he is not a madman, but a fanatic excited by revolutionary literature.

Proposals for a Conference on the Franco-Chinese difficulty have been made by the Chinese minister in Europe. The announcement of the fact has given a more hopeful aspect to the situation, which at the beginning of last week appeared unmistakably warlike. The Marquess Tseng proposed as a basis of negotiation the abandonment of the French designs on Bac-Ninh, and he offered on the part of China the surrender of the claim to the neutral zone, the line of the frontier to follow the course of the Red River from Songkoi. M. Ferry required time in order to refer the matter to the Cabinet. China is, however, preparing vigorously for war. One iron-clad is ready to sail from Stettin, and its departure would have taken place but for an order to delay it under fears, it is believed, of seizure by the French. A third iron-clad is ready to be launched on the 1st of December, when General Papini, the chief of the German Admiralty, will act as sponsor.

An Explicit and Emphatic Contradiction of the recent remarkable statement of the French Minister in China has been published. M. Tricou stated in a despatch to his government that the Viceroy of Canton disapproved of the conduct of the Marquess Tseng, the Chinese Minister in Europe, and that the Chinese Government repudiated him. The despatch now published proves that M. Tricou's statements were untrue. Both the government of China and Li Hung Chang, the viceroy, deny having expressed the slightest desire that M. Tricou should remain in China as the French agent, and testify their unqualified approval of the manner in which the Marquess Tseng has carried out his instructions from his government on the Tonquin question. It is now generally believed in Europe that M. Tricou sent the despatch in obedience to a call from his government, which desired some such intimation to justify their conduct to the Chambers. Late telegrams represent the prospect of a Franco-Chiense war as inevitable.

The Visit of the Crown Prince of Germany to the Spanish capital has aroused a vehement outburst of indignation in the French press, as was expected. The announcement that the prince will return to Germany by way of Italy, staying a few days with the king of that country, has added fuel to the fire. The friendly visits of the prince to the two potentates is accepted as an intimation to France that she is isolated in Europe, and that the sympathies of her neighbors are entirely with her enemy The London correspondent of the Sun, commenting on the general aspect of European affairs, says: "The uneasiness about the continuance of peace has passed into open menaces of war. The tone of the German journals has become absolutely savage. One journal remarks that, since a bloody struggle is inevitable, the sooner it takes place the better; and another newspaper declares that any insults in Spain to the Crown Prince under French instigation would popularize the idea of a war. At the same time military newspapers inform Italy that she will have to take the offensive in defence of her German ally, and lecture her on the backward state of her artillery. In France there is a cowed silence, but fierce rage, the daily and offensive admonitions received from English as well as German journals, and the open defiance of a barbarous power like China have added to her irritation. Things look ugly all around, but while Spain is receiving the Crown Prince, the help of a Russian alliance cannot be relied on by the French Republic." In spite, however, of these sinister rumors there is a general conviction that France will take care to avoid a European war in which her antagonists would be numerous and formidable.

A Disintegration of Political Parties in England appears to be in progress. The recent radical conference at Leeds has disclosed to the moderate members of the Liberal party the designs cherished by the more progressive wing. The consequence has been that the Whigs find themselves more in sympathy with the Conservatives than with their traditional allies. Many of the objects for which the Radicals are working would be opposed as vigorously by the Whig section of the Liberal party as by the Conservatives. Prominent among the discontented Whigs is the Duke of Argyll, the father of the Marquis of Lorne, who has filled Castle Inverary with a representative company of Scottish nobility and English Whigs, whom he invited to meet Lord Salisbury, who is the leader of the Conservatives. The London correspondent of the Times says: "The duke is believed to have in contemplation plans for going over to the side of the Conservatives, and this really seems to be about the only course he will have left to himself should the Radicals carry forward all their schemes." The Duke of Argyll, it will be remembered, was formerly a member of Mr. Gladstone's cabinet, but seceded from it because of his opposition to the premier's Irish policy.

The Outcast Poor of London are Becoming a political issue. The attention called to their condition by the Marquis of Salisbury's publication is general. Sir Charles Dilke, one of the Radical members of the Liberal administration, has paid several visits to the poorest localities in order by personal inspection to satisfy himself as to the actual condition of the wretched people who herd together in the tenement houses. It is evident from the public utterances of members of the Cabinet that any effort to afford the poor, government assistance will not receive unanimous support. Mr. Fawcett, who is Postmaster-General, true to his doctrines of political economy, while expressing deep sympathy for the condition of the poor, has warned the public against the danger of legislative interference tending to weaken the great and sacred principle of self-reliance, while Mr. Chamberlain appears anxious to relieve their misery.

The Jordan Canal Project is Still under Consideration. Its future is likely to be materially influenced by the report of an expedition recently sent out by the Palestine Exploration Society. This expedition has gone out for the purpose of a geological survey of the country lying between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akaba. The objects are purely scientific, but the results of the survey will be looked forward to with much interest, as likely to throw light upon the question of the practicableness or otherwise of the Jordan Valley Canal scheme. It is proposed, after reaching the Dead Sea, to include the whole length of the Jordan Valley, from Jericho to the Sea of Tiberias, in the line of route.

A State of Siege has been Proclaimed in five districts of Servia and there have been renewed conflicts between the insurgents and the military. The disaffection is described in European journals as having been caused by the summary manner in which the legislative chambers, called the Skuptschina, were dissolved after the radical successes and the heavy conscription levied by King Milan. The demands of the insurgents as formulated by their leader, M. Pastritch, are in the form of a draft of a constitution. It is of an almost republican character, but adopts the name of monarchial governmnt, under the reigning family of Obrenovitch, and allows a woman to reign. It lays down that the sovereign power rests in the nation, and is deputed to the Skuptschina, the ruler executing its will; that the army cannot be mobilized without the consent of the Skuptschina; that the king may not refuse to sign a law which has been passed more than once, and that the ministers shall be liable to be tried for their political acts.

Pastor Stoecker, the German Court Preacher, who was prominent in the recent agitation against the Jews, is paying a visit to England. He has learned there that his attitude on the anti-Semitic question is notorious. Herr Stoecker went to England ostensibly to take part in the Luther celebrations, but the British public appear to have ignored his character as a Lutheran preacher, and recognized only his anti-Jewish character, which won for him friends as well as enemies. The Lord Mayor of London administered a snub by refusing him the use of the Mansion House for his lectures. When he hired a hall in which to speak he was received with rudeness, and his remarks evoked retorts more forcible than courteous. On two occasions the audience sang songs and were so riotous that the meetings broke up in confusion without Stoecker's lecture being delivered. The most energetic and determined of Stoecker's opponents were his own countrymen resident in London, who apparently disliked him in his character as court preacher as much as in that of leader of the anti-Jewish agitation.

Rijutei, the Converted Corean Nobleman, whose portrait appeared in this journal on October 25th, is still earnestly working in the cause of Christ. Dr. H. Loomis, writing to a contemporary from Yokohama under date of October 4th, relates the following incident about him: "Rijutei has recently begun teaching in the government university. A week ago last Sabbath, the teacher of Chinese called upon him, and by means of writing they were able to converse very readily, as the Coreans use the Chinese characters. After the usual compliments, the Chinaman introduced some trifling subject, when Rijutei replied, 'Let us talk of something profitable.' 'What shall it be?' said the Chinaman. Rijutei added, 'I would like to talk of Jehovah, the true and only God.' 'What!' said his friend, 'are you a Christian?' 'Yes,' said Rijutei. 'And so am I,' said the teacher." Efforts are being made to induce Rijutei to join the Roman Catholic Church, but after a priest had spent three hours in argument with him, Rijutei frankly said that having studied the Bible carefully he could not accept the priest's creed. Rijutei is about to commence the holding of a public Christian service in Japan, and fully believes that in the course of time he will be allowed to preach in his own country.

AMONG the days that stand out conspicuously on the page of history, one more brilliant than almost any other, challenges attention, and deserves to live in the memory of every lover of liberty. The scene which renders that day memorable was one of the grandest in human history. It occurred in the ancient city of Worms, in Germany. It was the seventeenth of April, 1521. The city was profoundly moved. Gathered within its walls was an assemblage of princes, cardinals, prelates and nobles, over whom presided Charles V., Emperor of Germany, King of Spain, etc. Before that illustrious throng appeared one simple, solitary peasant-monk to answer for himself. The day before, he had entered the city in a common cart, wearing a coat he had borrowed from a friend, that he might appear decently clad before the august tribunal. Escorted by a crowd of cavaliers, his approach heralded by the warder on the walls with blast of trumpet, the low-born peasant rode into the city, knowing well that the chances of his ever leaving it alive were few and small. His accuser was a Cardinal of the Church of Rome, sagacious, crafty, cruel. The Emperor, his judge, was a man bound by the interests of his throne, the demands of his subjects in Spain, and by the traditions of his house to decide against him, and who had already placed himself on record in the case by ordering his books to be publicly burned. Around him were men of noble birth, loyal to the throne, and whose friendship for the accused was silent, extending only to a determination that he should have a fair trial.

A chronicler who saw Martin Luther descend from his humble conveyance on that day, and enter his poor lodging, describes the man, whom the most powerful princes in Europe had already in their hearts condemned to the stake. "A man of middle height, so lean from study and anxiety that his bones might be counted. On his feet he stood remarkably firm, body bent rather back than forward, the face thrown up, and the eyes flashing like a lion's." "The demonic eyes with which he glanced about him" were particularly noticed. He had been summoned, and he came. What to him was it that his life was in peril? He had come to answer for the truth—and as he confronted—single-handed, that imposing assemblage he quailed not, but appealed to One higher than the highest.

WHO WAS HE

who thus stirred the hearts of the Princes of Germany and the rulers of the church, about whom all the world was talking, and who must at any cost be silenced? "I am a peasant's son," Luther wrote; "father, grandfather, great-grandfather were all peasants." His father, Hans, or John, Luther, was a miner. Thirty-eight years before that august assemblage met in Worms, he had left his native village of Mohra, on the skirts of the Thuringian Forest in Saxony, and had gone to Eisleben, where opportunities for earning money were more abundant. He had only just been married to Margaret Lindermann, a peasant girl, and it was necessary that he should be in the way of getting money. To Eisleben they went, and there, on November 10th, 1483, their eldest son, Martin Luther, was born.

Six months later the family removed to Mansfeld, a few miles distant, and there the miner worked with his pick in the mines, while his wife cut and carried the wood for the cottage. They had seven children whom they trained up to fear God and to lead honest, virtuous lives. The father must have been a man of shrewdness and sound common-sense. One anecdote related of him affords an indication of the source from which his illustrious son derived some of his prominent characteristics. John Luther was ill and believed to be near death. The thought that his wife and his seven children must be left to battle with the world, bereft of their natural protector, weighed on the good man's mind. But it was of no use repining, and as the custom was, he sent for a priest to prepare him for death. The priest urged him to leave a legacy to the church. The sick man calmly answered, "I have many children, I will give what I have to them; they need it more." But Hans Luther did not die that time. He lived to see his eldest son the most famous man in Christendom.

Hans Luther determined that the boy Martin should have a good EDUCATION.

He was sent to the village school where he was to be taught reading and writing and the rudiments of Latin. Thence he was sent to a better school at Magdeburg and subsequently to one still further advanced at Eisenach. He remained at Eisenach three years, eking out his slender resources by singing carols from door to door and receiving for his music such money or food as the charitable burghers were inclined to give. He met with much rough treatment and abuse, but happily, one lady, Frau von Cotta, the wife of a wealthy citizen, attracted by the lad's bright eyes and sweet voice, befriended him. She called him into her house and gave him food (see frontispiece), and after that Martin Luther, as long as he remained at Eisenach, knew where he could always have a meal and sit in a warm corner by the kitchen fire.

His father having destined him to the profession of the law, Martin Luther entered the University of Erfurt, then the most famous seat of learning in Germany. His mind developed rapidly at Erfurt. His ambition was aroused, and he studied hard. He rose by the regular gradations until he took his Master-of-Arts degree with high honors. The young student, by his learning, wit and eloquence, attracted the attention of the whole university, and it appeared to all who knew him that he was destined to be one of the most brilliant and profound lawyers in Germany. He left the University to pay a brief visit to his parents at Mansfeld, and the next day, after his return from that visit, he resigned all his brilliant prospects and BECAME A MONK.

This extraordinary step was a disappointment to all Luther's friends. It was a disappointment to himself; but it was inevitable. His soul was of that intense nature on which truth operates powerfully and decisively. In the library at Erfurt he had found a Latin Bible which he had studied and meditated over. It was a book but little read in those days, even by priests, and though Luther was twenty-two years of age he had never seen a copy before. Much of its teaching was dark to him, but his study of it, combined with self-examination, conducted him to one startling conclusion. He realized that he was not what he ought to be, nor what God required him to be. In a word, learned and clever as he was, he was a sinner before God.

Knowing what we know of Luther's character, it is not difficult to realize the effect of this half-knowledge on the young student's mind. In the Gospel light of our day the consciousness of sin is always accompanied by the knowledge of the Atonement of Christ. But Luther had not that light. A single ray from the sacred page had pierced his heart and shown him its corruption. He was appalled. Like all strong natures he could not rest under conviction such as that. Close upon the revelation thus gained came the sudden death of an intimate friend, and finally, returning from Mansfeld, a thunderbolt, which fell close at his feet, tearing up the earth, so alarmed him that on the impulse of the moment he vowed that if God would spare his life he would enter a monastery. That vow he regarded as irrevocable. On his arrival at Erfurt he immediately resigned his position in the University, returned his Master-of-Arts ring and quitted the scene of his struggles and triumphs. The next day he knocked at the gates of the Augustine monastery, and was admitted.

THE SEARCH FOR LIGHT

was continued within the walls of the monastery with redoubled energy. To Luther's companions and teachers there, his state of mind was incomprehensible. It argued a strangely obstinate spirit in him that the regimen which gave ease to others failed to relieve this young lawyer. Fasting, penances, humiliating offices were assigned him, yet this clear-sighted novice, whose heart God had touched, could see in them no merit that would atone for sin or regenerate him. He performed the most menial labors cheerfully; he even took a sack and went around the city to beg food for the support of himself and his brethren, but he found no peace. But he was doing one hopeful thing. In the oratory of the monastery was an old Latin Bible chained to a reading stand. (See Frontispiece.) At that stand Luther might be found whenever the duties of his order permitted him. He studied diligently and prayerfully, and his mind became saturated with scriptural truth. So ended his novitiate, and he took the vows and became full monk and priest.

HIS REMOVAL TO WITTENBERG, which was an important epoch in Luther's life, was the outcome of his biblical studies. Among the teachers to whom the distressed monk went for advice, was Staupitz, the vicar general of his order. He was a shrewd administrator and an acute judge of character. The young monk's enthusiasm, his clear logical mind, his persistent search after truth, and his intimate acquaintance with the Bible, made a profound impression on Staupitz. He believed, however, that the best remedy for Luther's trouble was to take his attention off himself and set him to congenial and useful work. A professor of theology and philosophy was needed for the newly founded University of Wittenberg, and if any man in all Germany was qualified for the task Staupitz believed it was Luther, and he assigned him that labor. He was but twenty-five years of age, but his knowledge of the sacred word was in those days unrivalled.

Such lectures as Luther delivered at Wittenberg were nowhere else heard. Young men disgusted with the old forms of superstition, still more disgusted by the immoralities of professors of religion, were beginning to think for themselves. The bold original thinker who was professor of theology at Wittenberg became famous, and students from all parts of Germany crowded to listen. To Luther himself, however, the true light was not yet revealed. It broke upon him suddenly.

VISIT TO ROME.

In 1511 the business of the Augustine order demanded that two of its members should go to Rome, and Luther, eager for light, of which he then regarded Rome, the seat of the Pope, as the centre and source, volunteered to go. He walked with a companion the whole distance, and remained one month. The impressions of that visit were indelible. He found that the profligacy of the cardinals was current gossip, that religion was scoffed at, and he actually heard a priest officiating at the altar in the office Luther regarded as the most solemn of which he could conceive, say scornfully in place of the words which were supposed to miraculously turn the bread into the very body of Christ, "Bread thou art and bread thou remainest," at the same time elevating it for the people to worship. Such levity and such immorality as he witnessed he never forgot. In after years he said, "I would not for a hundred thousand gulden have missed seeing Rome. I might else have thought I did the Pope injustice."

A REVELATION.

But he was intent on obtaining real benefit from his visit, albeit his faith in the Pope and the Papal Court was shaken. Among the penances

MODERN CONFUSION.

If so much doubt and unbelief prevailed among the disciples of our Lord concerning His own resurrection, it is not surprising that a similar spirit should have been exhibited in the subsequent ages of the Church with respect to the resurrection of the members of His spiritual body. Notwithstanding the additional light which the Epistles of Paul have cast on the general testimony of the Sacred record; notwithstanding the clue of interpretation given in "the Revelation of Jesus Christ," for the solution of corresponding passages in either Testament; the subject yet remains obscure and intricate to the majority of professed and even devout believers. The time, and nature, and order of this great event, are, for the most part, merged in generalities, or confounded with the popular idea of the Last Judgment; and it is possible for many things to be advanced upon the subject, on good and solid foundation, which would still appear as idle tales to many of the members of the Churches, who, while receiving the Scriptures, are yet slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken. Many, like Martha, would say of a departed brother, "I know that he shall rise again at the last day," who know not the hour and "power of that resurrection" which is peculiar to those only who are quickened together with Christ, as "bone of His bone, and flesh of His flesh," the "members incorporate in His mystical body."

"THE RESURRECTION OF THE JUST."

A few in all ages have followed the beloved John from Calvary to Patmos, and by faith have seen the glory of God in that ulterior dispensation, most fully revealed to him who first believed in the resurrection of his Lord. They have meditated with delightful anticipation over the sepulchre of "the First Begotten from the dead;" and considering that "the graves were opened, and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of their graves after His resurrection, and appeared unto many," they have not been backward to believe or to declare the counsel of God, as spoken by the prophets, concerning "the whole house of Israel."

It is enough for them that it is written, "Behold, O My people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you unto the land of Israel" (Ezekiel 37 : 12). These words are too specific to admit of a merely figurative application, and the context abundantly proves their reference to a local and yet future dispensation. "The resurrection of the just" (Luke 14 : 14); "The resurrection of life" (John 5 : 29); "A better resurrection" (Heb. 11 : 35); "The first resurrection" (Rev. 20 : 5), appear to be terms declaratory of some remarkable distinctions to be put between the evil and the good, not only as to their final sentence of condemnation or acquittal, but as to the time and circumstances of the resuscitation of their bodies.

"THE CHILDREN OF THE RESURRECTION."

"The children (sons) of God" are so named by Christ, when speaking on the subject (Luke 20 : 36), "being the children (sons) of the resurrection;" and if this were intended solely of the fact that their bodies shall be raised, in common with "the rest of the dead," it would seem no such distinguishing title as it is made in that passage, with reference, moreover, to a period of time and an age of the world during which the rest of the dead are not restored to life at all. If there be no such distinctions as implied above, what construction is to be put upon the earnest desire of Paul, "if by any means I might attain to the resurrection of the dead?" (Phil. 3 : 11). The spiritual resurrection of the soul by faith he had already attained to; he was, in this sense, "risen with Christ;" and no peculiar means were requisite to certify the resurrection of his own body, for he knew, from his Master's assurance, that "all who are in their graves should come forth."

He who of old "was called in question touching the resurrection of the dead," well knew that "in Christ all shall be made alive;" but he was taught to give to each a gradation and priority of rank and succession: "Christ the first fruits" [He should be the first that should rise from the dead] (Acts 26 : 23); afterward they that are Christ's at His coming (1 Cor. 15 : 23). He was willing to be "planted in the likeness of His death, that He might be also in the likeness of His resurrection" (Rom. 6 : 5). He desired to "suffer with Christ, that he might be glorified together with Him" (Rom. 8 : 17); to be made "conformable to His death, that he might attain to a resurrection," which he seems to distinguish from any other by a word never applied to the general resurrection, or to that of the unjust—it seems to express a rising up out of the mass of the dead. The word is exanastasis, while the usual word, anastasis, in the passage referred to (Phil. 3 : 10) is used of Christ's own resurrection.

WHEN WILL IT TAKE PLACE?

Thus it appears that the first resurrection is that of those who have suffered for the truth, or otherwise borne a faithful testimony (Rev. 20 : 4; 11 : 18). It is coincident with the coming and kingdom of Christ, when "the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints" (Zech. 14 : 5). At the opening of the fourth seal, power is given to death and hell, "to kill with the sword, and with hunger, with the beasts of the earth." Under the fifth seal, they "that were slain for the Word of God, and for the testimony which they held," cried, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost Thou not judge, and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" when it was said unto them, that "they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow-servants also, and their brethren that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled" (Rev. 6 : 9, 10). At the sounding of the seventh trumpet, Christ takes His kingdom and reigns; "and the nations were angry; and Thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that Thou shouldest give reward unto Thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear Thy name, small and great."

The time of the dead is manifestly their resurrection, or "the resurrection of the just;" and their reward is, that they receive their glorified bodies, and live and reign with Christ; for on the binding of Satan, and the destruction of the bestial or Roman Empire in its final development and consummation, "the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast," etc.; they "lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years, but the rest of the dead lived not again until a thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection." The passage may be rendered, "this is the resurrection the first," "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power" (Rev. 20 : 6).

THE "TIMES OF REFRESHING."

It is evident from an examination of the Scriptures on the subject, that the first resurrection is immediately connected with the appearance, and kingdom, and coming of Christ, "with all His saints," when "He shall change their vile body (or the body of humiliation, soma tês tapeinôseôs) that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body" (Phil. 3 : 21—comp. verses 10, 11); when "He will present them faultless before His presence with exceeding joy" (Jude 24); "holy, and unblamable, and unreprovable in His sight" (Col. 1 : 22), when they who are already risen in spirit with Christ, and are seeking those things that are above, shall also appear with Him in glory, when "the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord" (Acts 3 : 19). The expression in our translation of this passage—both in the Authorized Version and in the Revised—falls far short of the original word, and seems only its secondary sense. If there be meaning in language, it signifies the times, or seasons, of reanimation—restoration of the soul to the body, according to all analogy of diction.

If this be so, the meaning of the expressions in Rev. 20 : 4–6 is plain enough, and cleared at once from all objections raised against the doctrine so clearly maintained by the context. Because John speaks of the souls, it may be suggested, it does not follow that the bodies were raised at that time, but at the last and general resurrection. But, let it be observed, they that lived were they that were beheaded, who had not received the mark of the beast on their forehead or hands. These are all bodily signs; and as the martyrs had glorified Christ in their "bodies terrestrial," so now they are glorified by Christ with "bodies celestial." John says, "I saw thrones and they sat upon them." The bodies were beheaded, but now they lived—their souls were reunited to them; this is the time of their reanimation, for the soul is the life of the body.

"The souls of the righteous," being "in the hand of God," and their life "hidden with Christ," could not properly be said to live again out of the body, in any sense, or to be reanimated at all. In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die; but in the time of their visitation they shall shine, and run to and fro, like sparks among the stubble; they shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and their Lord shall reign forever. "We fools accounted his life madness, and his end to be without honor; how is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints." "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord." "Blessed is he that hath part in the first resurrection." appears to take place before "the white throne and Him that sat on it," at the expiration of the thousand years; when death and hell (Hades) give up their dead (Rev. 20 : 11–15); which is the last judgment according to works, and is thus distinguished in the parallel account (Matthew 25 : 30), where the Second Advent is set forth under the figure of the nobleman who cometh, after his temporary absence, to take account of his servants; when the unprofitable servant is cast alive into outer darkness; as the false prophet in the Revelation is, at the same period, cast alive into the lake of fire.

THE GENERAL RESURRECTION

When defending himself before the tribunal of a Roman governor, Paul testifies, "There shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust." When writing to a Church of believers, he points to a distinction between the two, which he does not stop to explain to heathen ears; he did not cast such a pearl before those who would turn and rend him. And as the doctrines of the first resurrection and the coming kingdom on earth, were in the first centuries of the Christian era considered among the tests of entire orthodoxy, so now they will not amalgamate with the heresies of the last. Their gold is that of the sanctuary, and will lose nothing by refinement in its fire but the dross of imperfect and inadequate interpretation.

And surely, while such diligence is manifested in the revival of exploded errors, an earnest recommendation to search into and publish neglected truths cannot be unseasonable—and the first resurrection is one of them. Out of the old fields, assuredly, shall the new corn spring, and this doctrine must have a wider acceptance as the Scriptures are reverently consulted. It is hidden therein, as seed in the ground, and it will take root downward and bear fruit upward. It is planted in the house, and will flourish in the courts of the Lord. It has arisen already as a day-star in the hearts of many who believe; and it will set no more till the Sun of Rightousness shall burst on a benighted Church, and a world that sitteth in darkness; till the noble army of martyrs shall appear, "clothed in fine linen, white and clean;" till Jerusalem shall awake and arise, and shake herself from the dust, and put on her beautiful garments; when the holy Church throughout all the world shall be astonished at the fulness of her salvation, and walk evermore in the light of her glory.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Observance of Thanksgiving-Day by all Christian people is a duty they owe to their profession and to the country. There is an increasing tendency to spend the day simply as a holiday, in which the pleasures of the table occupy a prominent place. The day is not set apart for gloomy occupations, and its associations are the reverse of sad, but neither should it be spent in thoughtless pleasure. God has blessed us, as a nation, during the past year, and it is fitting that especially on the day appointed for the purpose we should render to Him our humble thanks. As we do so, let us pray that as He has given this land abundant temporal blessings, He will pour out upon it the riches of His spiritual blessings.

The Struggle for the Speakership Increases in interest and intensity as the time for the assembling of Congress approaches. It is generally understood that the question of the tariff will be the deciding element in the election of the speaker. Other questions will, of course, operate in the election, but the attitude of the candidates on the issue of protection and free trade will, it is believed, be the decisive consideration. The speaker's power in the selection of committees and in suppressing irrelevant debate give him an important and commanding position in influencing the policy of the country. It may be assumed that the election of Mr. Randall will imply that the majority are indisposed to reduce the tariff. Mr. Carlisle's election will show that the tendency to free trade is strong in the House, while the election of Mr. S. S. Cox will suggest the inference that another effort will be made to combine a certain degree of protection with a reduction of duties. The general impression in the country is that Mr. Randall's prospects are the most hopeful of the three.

Admiral Porter, of the Navy, takes a discouraging view of our situation as a nation in the event of our being involved in war. Happily there are no indications that such a calamity is likely to occur, but it is disquieting to learn that, notwithstanding the enormous sums expended, our navy is utterly powerless for the defence of the coasts. In his annual report, published last week, Admiral Porter says: "As it is universally admitted that we have no navy either for offence or defence, I don't see any reason why Congress should not appropriate liberally for an immediate increase of the navy, as it did in the time of the late civil war. We are now, in fact, in as bad a condition as we were at the breaking out of that conflict, though then we could conform to the law of nations by buying up every old ferryboat and rattle-trap that could mount a gun, and using them to blockade the Southern ports. If Spain—the least formidable of maritime nations—went to war with us to-morrow she would sweep our gradually increasing commerce from the ocean by setting afloat the large, swift steamers she could buy in Europe, and we could not prevent it." Admiral Porter calls attention to the fact that coal is now declared contraband of war, and therefore in the event of war a United States ship in a foreign port would not be allowed to purchase coal. She would, having no coaling stations, as European nations have, be compelled to return home under sail, and he therefore recommends that in building new ships special attention should be paid to their sailing qualities. He also urges that a more extensive use should be made of torpedoes and torpedo-boats.

The Testimony before the Court of Inquiry in the Proteus disaster last week confirmed that previously given. Commander F. Wildes said frankly that one reason for the failure of the expedition was that a great and important enterprise had been undertaken with insufficient and scanty means. Two ships were sent North—unlike each other in powers—one as a reserve ship. The other—the leading ship—the one which was to do the work, was a foreign ship, officered and manned by British officers and a British crew; flying a British flag; the crew picked up anywhere and everywhere; not seamen at all; an expedition of landsmen sent upon a service which required a knowledge of how to live either upon the water or the land or upon the ice as well; a supporting ship sent up which was not suitable for the purpose, carrying too large a crew and not enough provisions, entirely unfitted for ice encounters, liable to be caught in the ice and meet with a much graver disaster than was actually experienced. On the other hand, Captain Pike, who has been invited to give testimony, is expected to contradict the charges against the crew. He has written a letter to a newspaper, in which he indignantly denies that there was drunkenness or robbery.

The Tenement House Question, so Vital to the social welfare of the country, has attained new prominence by the publication, in a sanitary journal, of the results of an experiment recently made in New York. It was generally supposed that only from philanthropic action could relief be hoped. This report shows that as a business speculation the erection of decent dwellings is profitable. Several large tenement houses, erected in accordance with the best sanitary principles, with light rooms, clean stairways and bathing privileges, have paid more than six per cent clear during the past year on the money invested. The tenements are in continual request, and never stand empty. It may be hoped that this successful experiment will encourage capitalists to tear down the wretched dwellings now occupied by the poor to the injury of health and morals, and erect in their place decent and salubrious houses.

The Adoption of War as a Remedy for Polygamy was strongly deprecated at a meeting of Congregational ministers and missionaries recently held in New York, by Miss Carter, who pleaded earnestly against so extreme and, as she believed, unchristian a measure, she expressed her conviction that Christian schools were solving the problem by creating a public sentiment averse to polygamy. Multitudes, she said, had turned from Mormonism, and the young people especially, who have seen their mothers suffer will have nothing to do with it.

An Effort to Find Occupation for Female Immigrants from Europe is being made. Miss Emily Faithfull, who has for many years devoted her attention to this work, is now travelling through the Western States with the view of ascertaining the prospects of an extensive importation of ladies from England, and the probabilities of their being able to maintain themselves by suitable labor. In the course of an interview with a reporter, she said: "I am going through the West to Colorado and California, and will investigate carefully the different employments which are open to women. I will pay particular attention to artistic employments and work in art decoration. I wish to see for myself practically what can be done in the way of finding work in which women may support themselves, and I wish to do it thoroughly. There are immense numbers of educated women in England who want a freer scope for their energies and abilities than they can find there, and I wish to help them. I find that the employments which women can enter in the Eastern States are pretty well filled up, but I hope to find plenty of work for them in the West."

By the Death of Dr. J. Marion Sims our country loses one of her most skilful surgeons as well as an eminent philanthropist. Dr. Sims was well known in Europe where he was frequently in request for delicate and dangerous operations. It was his custom to spend several months of each year in Paris, where he operated in nine different hospitals. By special invitation he visited the hospitals in Brussels, and performed operations before the members of the faculty. He was the inventor of a surgical instrument which is extensively used, and which has relieved the agony of thousands of sufferers. He was the founder of the Woman's Hospital in New York. He died suddenly, of heart disease, on November 13th.

The Rapid Increase in the Number of Divorces applied for and granted during the past two years has led to the formation in several States of associations for promoting reform in the divorce laws and the assimilation of the laws of the various States. It is now announced that committees appointed by authority to represent the Episcopal, Presbyterian, Congregational, Methodist, Baptist and Reformed Churches of Ohio have decided to hold a convention in Columbus, on December 6th, for the purpose of organizing an Ohio Divorce Reform League. Addresses will be delivered by the Rev. Dr. Dike, Secretary of the New England Divorce Reform League, the Rev. Dr. Gladden, of Columbus, Bishop Bedell, and others.

The Bowery Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York has issued an appeal signed by the Chairman, Mr. C. H. Dodge, for assistance in the philanthropic department of its work. The association, beside assisting young men to obtain situations, assists many destitute applicants with gifts of meals and clothing. Many young men, strangers in the city, have, through this timely assistance, been saved from utter destitution, and are now earning a livelihood. If it had not been rendered they might have drifted into the ranks from which the criminal classes are recruited. This work is one of public benefit, and deserves encouragement. Gifts of clothing, provisions or money will be welcomed. Gifts of money should be sent to the treasurer, Mr. C. N. Talbot, 38 Pine Street, New York. The Association will gladly send for packages of clothing or provisions, if notified by mail. The whole of this fund is expended in relief, no deductions being made for salaries, rent, or any other expense.

Mrs. Shipman's Services at Lowell, Mass., are being signally blessed of God. The meetings have been crowded on every evening, and many persons have come forward to confess Christ publicly, as the result of God's blessing on the services. The work is still going on with no diminution of interest, and a deep spiritual movement is spreading through all the churches of the city.

Mr. Oakes, the Evangelist, whose Successful work among young men in New York we have previously mentioned, has arrived safely at his new sphere of labor in Pueblo, Cal. Mr. Oakes has been invited to accept the pastorate of the First Baptist Church, which has a new house of worship in course of erection. The church is fortunate in securing a pastor of Mr. Oakes's energy, as they still need $3000 to open their new edifice clear of debt.

Mr. George C. Needham is Conducting Services at Newport, R. I., with remarkable success. Crowded meetings assemble in the Friends' Meeting House every evening, and on Sundays Mr. Needham conducts services in the Y. M. C. A. building, and in the United Congregational Church. He has also preached, by invitation, in the Second Baptist Church.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Complete Annihilation of the Egyptian army in the Soudan is reported. Intelligence was received at Cairo on November 22d, from Khartoum that El Mahdi, the False Prophet, had attacked and utterly destroyed the Egyptian force under General Hicks, the English commander. Only two persons, one of them an artist, are said to have escaped. The despatch describing the battle says that when Hicks Pacha, who commanded the remnant of Arabi's forces, reached Namua, near the Obeid Hills, he divided his army into two parts, sending one half to demand the surrender of the fortress. El Mahdi, advancing from the south-east, met this portion and sent forward dervishes, who were received with a volley, and fighting then began. Hearing the firing General Hicks came up, and his whole force formed a square. El Mahdi's Arabs attacked the army with reckless valor. The camels in the Egyptian army stampeded, and confusion was caused among the camp-followers, who numbered two thousand. The Egyptians fought well, and at evening the Mahdi fell back. The next day General Hicks accepted the guidance of a man who was a traitor. He led the army into a defile, in which General Hicks could not use his guns, and where he was surrounded by El Mahdi's reinforcements. The battle raged all day. On the third morning the square was broken, and General Hicks's force was annihilated. A correspondent of the London Daily News accompanied the expedition, and his letters, despatched previous to the engagement, showed that the Egyptian troops were badly disciplined, and were weakened and dispirited by want of proper food and by their long march. Ten British officers were with the expedition beside General Hicks.

El Mahdi, the False Prophet, who has Inflicted this crushing disaster, is a fanatical Moslem, whose power over the Arabs is absolute. They believe that he is the deliverer predicted to appear about this time, and he has cunningly stimulated their belief in his divine mission. According to one of the prophecies, on November 12th, the first day of the new Mussulman century, El Mahdi himself was to be proclaimed, at Khartoum, Prophet and Ruler of the Soudan. Having convinced his followers that he was in direct communication with the Almighty, he used, while addressing them, suddenly to become silent, and, closing his eyes, to remain motionless for several minutes. He carried this trick to such perfection that not the slightest movement was perceptible while he simulated coma, after which he appeared to recover from a state of profound lethargy, cast wondering glances around him, and exclaimed, with an air of conviction: "I come from Paradise, where I have been with Allah and His Prophet! How I would like to tell you of all I saw and heard! but you would not be able to understand it." His followers became so devoted to him that at a signal from him they were ready to sacrifice their lives. At last the Mahdi announced that Allah had definitively chosen him to be His prophet, which caused such enthusiasm among his adherents that he seized the opportunity to surround himself by a court. Several attempts to capture him were made by the Khédive without success, and his forces and prestige increased daily. When General Hicks undertook to lead an expedition against him his services were gladly accepted.

The German Crown-Prince has Received an enthusiastic reception in Spain. He landed at Valencia on November 22d, and was greeted by a crowd of ten thousand people, who received him with loud cheers. Picturesquely attired peasant girls presented him with baskets of flowers and fruit. After a brief stay he proceeded to Madrid, where another cordial welcome awaited him. King Alfonso, wearing his uniform as Colonel of German Uhlans, met the prince when he alighted from the train. Besides the notable persons, there was present a deputation of German residents carrying banners. King Alfonso and the Prince cordially embraced and kissed each other, and after a few moments' talk both entered a carriage drawn by four horses, with postilions and outriders, and drove to the palace, escorted by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards. The Prince's suite, with Spanish officers and officials, all brilliantly uniformed, followed in six carriages. All along the route the populace displayed respectful sympathy. Hats were often raised, and in some places cheers were given for the prince. At the Palace ex-Queen Isabella and the Infantas Isabel and Eulalie welcomed the visitor, and he was then conducted in great state to his apartments. The prince afterward held a reception, at which there were present the grandees of Spain, members of the aristocracy, ladies in waiting, and the high court officials. The cordiality of the reception excites irritation in France.

In the Franco-Chinese Difficulty the Negotiations have had no practical result. The Marquess Tseng, the Chinese Minister, has been informed that his proposals are not acceptable to the French Government. In the course of an interview published in a French journal, the Marquess said: "A long time ago the French Government was officially informed that Chinese regular troops were stationed at Bacninh, and should the French troops cross the Red River opposite Bacninh such an act would be regarded as equivalent to a declaration of war. Admiral Courbet would then have to measure swords with the Chinese regulars, who are already 30,000 strong in Tonquin, and who are so disposed as to be able at a moment's notice to march by three different routes against the French expeditionary force. These troops are all armed and equipped in the European manner. Among their officers are many Europeans, but, above all, several American engineers." It is, however, becoming a growing impression in Europe that China is blustering and will not venture on war unless herself attacked.

The Election of Mr. James Russell Lowell, our Minister to England, to the Lord Rectorship of St. Andrews University, took place on November 21st. The honor is purely literary, and the duties of the office consist mainly in the delivering of an inaugural address. Mr. Lowell's opponent made the contest on political grounds, and being a Conservative he had the support of the Conservative undergraduates. The honor done Mr. Lowell is regarded as a tribute to his scholarship and also of good-will to America.

More Explosives have been Captured in London, but this time they come from Germany, not from the Irish-Americans. On November 23d, about midnight, the police arrested a man named Wolff, who is a member of the Advanced Socialists' Club. A Frenchman named Bolderane gave the police the information which led to Wolff's arrest. Upon searching Wolff's house at Vincent Square, Westminster, the police discovered two infernal machines, which are considered to be of sufficient power to demolish any building. One of them consisted of a large zinc pail nearly filled with coarse blasting powder and gun cotton, covered with scrap iron, with a fuse at the bottom. The second machine was a large tin cooking utensil similarly prepared. It is supposed that Wolff's intention was to destroy the German Embassy.

Poole, the Irishman Charged with Murdering a man named Kenny, and who is believed to have been concerned in other murders, was convicted on November 20th, and sentenced to death. This was the second time that he was tried. In the first case the jury failed to agree. Before sentence was passed upon him Poole made a lengthy speech in which he denied his guilt in that case, but admitted that he was a member of the Fenian Brotherhood, and said he would be proud to go to the scaffold for being a member of it. Its object was not to commit murder, but to free Ireland from the tyrannical rule of England. He believed he was persecuted because he was an enemy of the government under which he had the misfortune to live. Poole was convicted on the testimony of his former friends and companions.

THE DEVIL'S LAST THROW.

A New Sermon* by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

OUR Lord Jesus Christ taught the people much by His words, but He taught them even more by His actions. He was always preaching, His whole life was a heavenly discourse on divine truth; and the miracles which He wrought were not only the proofs of His deity, but the illustrations of His teaching. His wonders of mercy were, in fact, acted sermons, truths embodied, pictorial illustrations appealing to the eye, and thus setting forth Gospel teaching quite as clearly as vocal speech could have done. When we read of the miracles of our Lord, we should not only accept them as proofs of His Deity, and seals of His commission, but as instructions as to the manner of His gracious working. What He did of old to the bodies of men should be received as a prophecy of what He is to-day prepared to do to the souls of men.

I suppose that we have never seen

although I am not quite sure about it; for some men exhibit symptoms which are very like it. The present existence of demons within the bodies of men I shall neither assert nor deny; but certainly, in our Saviour's day it was very common for devils to take possession of men and torment them greatly.

Since his defeat by our Lord, and by His apostles, it would seem that Satan's power over human bodies has been greatly limited; but we have still among us the same thing in another and worse shape, namely, the power of sin over men's minds. Satan works in all ungodly men, as a smith at his forge; do you wonder that they sometimes curse and swear? These are only the below, flying out of the chimney. I know passionate men in whom the fiercest of devils appear to rave and rage; and I could point out others whose love of lying betrays the presence of the father of lies. One blasphemes and uses such filthy language that we are sure his tongue is set on fire of hell, even if the prince of devils is not ruling it.

A man says, "Drink is ruining me, body and soul. I know that it is shortening my life. I have had delirium tremens, and I know that I shall have it again if I continue as I am; but I cannot leave the drink. Sometimes the craving comes over me, and I seem as if I must swallow the intoxicating draught, whether I will or no." Whether this is the devil, or whether it is altogether the man himself, I am not going to argue; but the drink-devil, whose name is legion, is certainly among us to this day, and we hear persons tell us that they are anxious to escape from its power, and yet they return to it, rushing to intoxication as the swine rushed into the sea when the demons had entered into them.

Need I mention another form of this evil in the shape of unchastity? How many a man there is—alas, it is true of women too!—struggling against a fierce passion, and yet that passion conquers them; the unclean desire comes upon them like a hurricane bearing all before it, and they yield to it as the sere leaf yields to the blast. Nay more, they rush into a sin which they themselves condemn, of which already they have tasted the bitter fruit; they could not be more eager for it if it were the purest of all enjoyments. As the moth dashes again into the candle which has burned its wings, so do men hurry into the vice which has filled them with misery. They are possessed and domineered over by the spirit of lust, and return to their crimes as the oxen return to the stream. I need not go further into details, for one man falls into sin in one way, and another falls after quite a different fashion.

ALL DEVILS ARE NOT ALIKE—

though they are alike evil. Anger differs from lust, and profligacy laughs at covetousness, yet are they all of one brood, privates in the same dreadful legion. Men practise differing sins, but their sins all manifest the same evil power. Unless Christ has set us free we are all in some shape or other under the dominion of the prince of darkness, the master of the forces of evil.

This poor young man of whom we are to talk to-night was brought into a most horrible condition through the influence of a Satanic spirit. He was a lunatic; reason had been dethroned He was an epileptic, so that if left alone he would fall into the fire or into the water. You have yourself seen persons in fits of epilepsy, and you know how dreadful would be their danger if they were taken in a fit in the middle of a street, or by the side of a river. In this youth's case the epilepsy was only the means by which the demon exercised his power, and this made his condition sevenfold worse than if it had been simply a disease. This afflicted one had become deaf and dumb besides, and very violent, so that he was capable of doing a great deal of mischief. But the poor demoniac had this one great advantage—that he had friends to aid in bringing him to Christ. I hope that all here who are not saved are privileged with relationship to some friend who seeks their salvation.

I. So, then, my first point shall be, that our hopes are all awakened. Here is a poor youth, but bad as he is, terribly possessed as he is, he is coming to Christ! Prayer has been offered for him by his father, and Jesus is near.

ALL LOOKS WELL!

Coming to Christ is not the best possible condition, for the best condition is to have already come to Him. For a hungry man to be coming to a dinner is not enough; he must actually reach the table and eat. For a sick man to be coming to an eminent physician is hopeful, but it is not enough; he must get to that physician, take his medicine, and be restored. That is the point. To be coming to Christ is not enough; you must actually come to Him, and really receive Him; for to such only does He give power to become the sons of God.

This poor child was coming, and so are some here; that is to say, they have begun to hear the Gospel with attention. They did not aforetime go anywhere on the Sabbath; nor did they get up very early on a Sunday morning. I can see a man who seldom rose on a Sunday morning, and when he did, he read his newspaper. The man I refer to is repenting of this wrong, and so you see him coming upon the Sunday morning to hear the Gospel. He hears it very attentively; he leans forward to catch every word, and he treasures up what he hears. We are sure that he is coming to Christ, for when he gets home he reaches down his Bible. He has begun to read the Word of God in an earnest way. He thought at one time that it was about the dullest book in the world. Assuredly this man is coming to Christ, for he searches the Scriptures. Note also that he has dropped his blasphemy and his unchastity. He is a purer man in mouth and body than he used to be. He is coming to Christ. But, as I said,

COMING IS NOT ENOUGH.

The thing is really to reach the Lord Jesus and to be healed by Him. I pray you, do not rest short of this. Still, this is all hopeful, very hopeful. The man is a hearer; he is also a reader of the Scriptures; he has begun to mend a bit; and I have heard—of course, I cannot tell, for I was not there to see—I have heard, I say, that the other night he began to pray. If so, I know that he is coming to Christ, for prayer is a sure token. He has not yet cast himself fully at the feet of Jesus, but he cries, "Lord, save me." He is coming, and I am as glad as the birds on a spring morning. The angels are watching; they are leaning from the battlements of heaven to see whether it will end rightly, and you and I are very hopeful, especially those of us who have been praying for this man; for since we see that there is some change in him, and he begins to think and pray, we look for his salvation, as men look for flowers when April showers are falling. So, you see, our hopes are excited.

II. And now I will read the text again—"As he was yet a coming, the devil threw him down, and tare him." By this our fears are aroused. What a sight it must have been! Here is the poor father bringing his lunatic son, and friends are helping him; they are getting him near the Saviour, and he is just coming to Him who can cure him, when, on a sudden, he is taken in a fearful fit, worse than he had ever suffered before. He is cast down, thrown about, dashed to and fro; he wallows on the ground; he seems to be flung up and down as by an unseen hand, we fear that he will be torn to pieces. See! he falls down like a dead man, and there he lies. As the crowd gathers around him, people cry, "He is dead." Does it not seem that when hope was at its brightest all should be dashed aside?

I have observed this thing scores of times; I might say, I think without exaggeration, hundreds of times. I have seen men, just when they were beginning to hear and beginning to think, taken on a sudden with such violence of sin, and so fearfully carried away by it, that if I had not seen the same thing before I should have despaired of them; but, having often seen it, I know what it means, and I am not so dismayed as a raw observer might be; though I must confess that it half breaks my heart when it happens to some hopeful convert whom I hoped to receive into the Church, and to rejoice over. We mourn when we hear that the man who was somewhat impressed has become and has gone back to the very vice from which we had rescued him. The case runs on the same lines as our text—"As he was a coming, the devil threw him down, and tare him."

How does the devil do this? Well, we have seen it done in this way: When the man had almost believed in Christ, but not quite, Satan seemed to multiply his temptations around him, and to bring his whole force to bear upon him. There is a wicked man in the shop, and the devil says to him, "Your mate is beginning to be serious: ridicule him. Tempt him all you can. Treat him to strong drink. Get him away to the theatre, the music-hall, or the brothel." It is wonderful how the ungodly will lay all kinds of traps for one who is escaping from his sins. They are fearfully set on keeping him from Christ.

I have known in addition to all this that Satan has stirred up the anxious one's bad passions. Passions that lay asleep have suddenly been aroused. Moreover, the man has become thoughtful, and from that very fact doubts which he never knew before have come upon him. He begins to mend, and now he finds a difficulty in getting his needle through where the rent was made. He finds that tearing is easier work than mending, and that running into sin is a much more easy thing than rising out of the black ditch into which he has fallen. So now, what with those about him tempting him, his bad passions responding to the temptation, and his doubts overclouding everything, it is not a marvellous thing that the poor creature grows worse before he gets better. The disease which before had been concealed in more hidden and vital parts, seems to be thrown out upon the surface, and the sight is sickening. This, however, is not always a bad sign. Doctors rather prefer it to an inward festering. So have I seen it when men have been coming to Christ; their boat has been tossed with tempest, and they have been driven far out upon a raging sea.

Yes, and I will tell you what I have seen. I have seen a man almost converted—well-nigh a believer in Christ, on a sudden become more obstinate in his opposition to the Gospel than ever he was before. A man that was quiet and harmless and inoffensive before has, under the influence of Satan, just when we hoped the best things of him, turned round in a rage against the people who sought to do him good, and he has spoken opprobriously of the Gospel which a little while before he seemed anxious to understand. Do not be astonished—you that are trying to bring men to Christ—if it should often happen that these lunatics break loose—that these epileptics have a worse fit just before Christ cures them than ever you knew them to have had before.

HOW SATAN OVERTHROWS.

I will describe the usual way in which the devil throws men down and tears them. You need not listen to this unless you like, because it does not relate to all of you here; but it is true of a sufficient number to render it needful for me to speak of it. It is a very curious thing that if there is a poor soul in London that is well-nigh insane through despair of heart he wants to talk to me. I am often sore burdened by the attempt to sympathize with the distracted. I do not know why they should be attracted to me, but they come to tell me of their evil state of mind—people who have never seen me before. This fact gives me a wide field of actual practice and careful observation.

I frequently meet with persons who are tempted with blasphemous thoughts. They have not yet laid hold on Christ, but they are trying to do so; and at this stage of their experience most horrible thoughts pass through their minds. They cannot prevent it; they hate the thoughts, and yet they come, till they are ready to lose their reason. I will tell you what happened to me. I was engaged in prayer alone in a quiet place one day when I had just found the Saviour, and while I was in prayer a most horrible stream of blasphemies came into my mind, till I clapped my hand to my mouth for fear that I should utter any one of them. I was so brought up that I do not remember ever hearing a man swear while I was a child; yet at that moment I seemed to know all the swearing and blasphemy that ever was in hell itself; and I wondered at myself. I could not understand whence this foul stream proceeded. I wrote to my venerable grandfather who was for sixty years a minister of the Gospel, and he said to me—"Do not trouble about it. These are no thoughts of yours; they are injected into your mind by Satan. The thoughts of men follow one another like the links of a chain, one link draws on another; but when a man is in prayer the next natural thought to prayer is not blasphemy; it is not, therefore, a natural succession of our own thoughts. An evil spirit casts those thoughts into the mind." Thoughts of this sort, seeing you loathe them, are none of yours. Do not let Satan lay his brats at your door, but send them packing.

When this does not answer, I have known Satan to throw the coming sinner down and tear him in another way. "There," says he, "did you not hear the preacher speaking about election? You are

NOT ONE OF THE ELECT."

"Perhaps I am not," says one. Perhaps you are, say I, and I think that whether you are one of the elect or not, you had better come, on the ground that Jesus says—"Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." If you come, He will not cast you out, and then you will find that you are one of the elect. Satan will throw men down and tear them in another way. "Ah!" says he, "you are too big a sinner." I make short work of that. No man is too big a sinner. "All manner of sin and of blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men." "Oh, but," says Satan,

"it is too late." Another lie of his. It is never too late so long as we are in this world, and come to Jesus for pardon. Generally in the case of young people he puts the clock back, and says, "It is too soon;" and then when they get old he puts the clock on, and says, "It is too late." It is never too late as long as Jesus lives, and the sinner repents. If a sinner were as old as Methuselah, if he came to Christ and trusted Him he would be saved.

"Oh but," the devil says, "it is no use your trying at all. The Gospel is not true." Ay, but it is true, for some of us have proved it. Conversion is the standing miracle of the Church; and while we see what it works every day in the week, we are confident and sure. When men that were passionate, dishonest, unchaste, covetous, become holy, gracious, loving, pure, generous, then we know that the Gospel is true by the effect which it produces. A lie would never produce holiness and love.

And then the devil will come with this—"It is of no use. Give it up; give it up." Many and many a man who has been on the brink of eternal life, has been thrown down and torn with this, "It is of no use; give it up. You have prayed, and you have not been answered: never pray again. You have attended the house of God, and you have become more miserable than ever; never go again. Ever since you have been a thinking man and a sober man, you have had more trouble than ever you had. See," says the devil, "what comes of your religion." Thus he tries to induce the newly awakened to give it up. But oh, in God's name, let me implore you do not turn from it, for you are on the brink of the grand discovery. Another turf turned, and there is the golden treasure.

III. I shall not detain you much longer. But as our hopes have been awakened and our fears have been aroused, let us look on the scene till our wonder is excited. Did you notice when I was reading in the ninth chapter of Mark, how Jesus healed this poor child?

HE DID HEAL HIM,

He healed him of all that complication, healed him of the devil's domination, healed him of the epilepsy, healed him of being deaf and dumb, healed him of being a lunatic, healed him of pining away; and in one moment that young man was completely saved from all his ills. He could speak; he could hear; he was cured of his epilepsy, and was no more a lunatic, but a happy rational being. The whole thing was done at once. Wonder, and never leave off wondering!

"Can a man be changed all at once? It must take a long time," says one. I admit there are certain qualities which come only by education and patient watchfulness. There are certain parts of the Christian character that come of culture, and must be watered with tears and prayer. But let me assure you, not as a matter of theory, but as a matter which I have seen for thirty years, that a man's character may be totally changed in less time than it takes me to tell you of it. There is such power in the name of Christ that, if that name be preached and the Spirit of God applies it, men can be turned right round. There can be a total reversal of all their conduct, and, what is more than that, of all their inclinations, and desires and wishes, and delights and hates; for God can take away the heart of stone and give a heart of flesh. The child of darkness can be translated into the kingdom of light. The dead heart can be quickened into a spiritual existence, and that in a single moment, by faith in Jesus Christ.

This cure was perfected at once, and it remained with the youth. The most charming point about it was that the Lord Jesus said, "Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him, into him." Enter no more into him—there is the glory of it! Though the epileptic fit was ended, yet the young man would not have been cured if the devil had returned to take possession of him again. The Saviour's cures endure the test of years. "Enter no more into him" preserved the young man by a life-long word of power.

AND ENTER NO MORE

I never dare to preach to anybody a temporary salvation. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," not for to-night merely, but forever. When God saves a man he is saved; not for weeks and years, but eternally. If Christ turns the devil out of him he shall enter into that man no more forever. Now, this is a salvation that is worth your having, and worth my preaching. A temporary, I had almost said, a trumpery salvation, that saves a man for a few months and then lets him perish, is not worth preaching or having; but that which so makes a man new as to put into him "a well of water springing up into everlasting life"—that is worth worlds. I will tell you which I like to tell on this point. Christmas Evans was once describing the prodigal's coming back to his father's house, and he said that when the prodigal sat at the father's table he sat there and did not eat, and every now and then the tears began to flow. His father turned to him and said, "My dear son, why are you unhappy? You spoil the feasting. Do you not know that I love you? Have I not joyfully received you?" "Yes," he said, "dear father, you are very kind, but have you really forgiven me? Have you forgiven me altogether, so that you will never be angry with me for all I have done?" His father looked on him with ineffable love and said, "I have blotted out thy sins and thy iniquities, and will remember them no more forever. Eat, my dear son."

The father turned round and waited on the guests, but by and by his eyes were on his boy, they could not be long removed. There was the son weeping again, but not eating. "Come, dear child," said his father, "come, why are you still mourning? What is it that you want?" Bursting into a flood of tears a second time, the son said, "Father, am I always to stop here? Will you never turn me out of doors?" The father replied, "No, my child, thou shalt go no more out forever, for a son abides forever." Still the son did not enjoy the banquet; there was still something rankling within, and again he wept. Then his father said, "Now, tell me, tell me, my dear son, all that is in thy heart. What do you desire more?" The son answered, "Father, will you make me stop here? Father, I am afraid lest, if I were left to myself, I might play the prodigal again. Oh, constrain me to stay here forever!" The father said, "I will put my fear in thy heart, and thou shalt not depart from me." "Ah! then," the son replied, "it is enough," and merrily he feasted with the rest. So I preach to you just this—that the great Father when He takes you to Himself will never let you go away from Him again.

Whatever your condition, if you trust your soul to Jesus, you shall be saved, and saved forever.

"Once in Christ, in Christ forever:
Nothing from His love can sever."

"But what if we fall into great sin?" says one. You shall not abide in great sin. You shall be kept and preserved by that same power which has begun the good work, for it will surely carry it on even to the end.

Just two or three sentences and I have finished. I have been speaking about the devil throwing some down and tearing them when they are coming to Christ. Are there any of you who do not know anything about it? Well, I am glad that you do not. If you come to Christ without being thrown down and torn I am glad of it. I have endeavored to help those that are terribly tormented; but if you are not so tried, do not wish to be.

After I was preaching Jesus Christ from this platform once, there came a man into the vestry who said to me, "Blessed be God that I entered this Tabernacle. I come from Canada, sir. My father, before he found true religion had to be and I always thought that I must undergo a similar terror before I could be saved." I said, "No, no, my dear friend, you are to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and if you do that, despond or not despond, you are a saved man." This Gospel I preach to you. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. Trust Him quietly, humbly, simply, immediately. Trust Him to make you a holy man—to deliver you from the power of the devil and the power of sin, and He will do it; I will be bound for Him that He will keep His word. Jesus is truth itself, and never breaks His word. He never boasts that He can do what He cannot do. He has gone into heaven, and He is therefore "able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them." Only trust Him. Trust Him to overcome the evil you have to fight with. You will conquer it, man, if you will only trust Jesus. Woman, there is hope for you if you will trust the wounded, bleeding, dying, risen, living Saviour. He will battle for you, and you shall get the victory.

God bless you, every one, and may we all meet in heaven to praise the Son of God forever and ever.

THE IRON HALL FOR THE MOODY AND SANKEY SERVICES.

On the next page is a picture of the great Iron Hall at Islington, in the north of London, in which the American evangelists are now holding services. When Mr. Moody accepted the invitation of the London clergymen to labor in their city this year, arrangements were immediately commenced for rendering the mission thorough in its work and accessible to all classes. Without any appeal being made for funds a sum worth thirty thousand dollars was placed at the disposal of the committee, by a few wealthy Christian gentlemen.

It was decided after consultation not to hold the meetings in churches or existing halls, but to erect a temporary structure for the purpose. The danger of fire and the inadequate means existing in London for dealing with large conflagrations being taken into account, it was decided that this structure should be of iron. That being settled, the next question that arose was how to save the time that might be lost in moving the building from place to place; for it was determined that the services should not be held alone in one quarter of the vast area covered by the city and suburbs of London. The people whom it was most important to attract to these services are widely scattered, and even if the building in which the services were to be held was situated in the very centre of the city, there would be thousands of people unable to attend them on account of the distance. The shifting of the location of the services was therefore a necessity, and then the moving of the hall became a serious consideration. As there was no lack of funds, it was decided to build two halls; the second to be ready for occupation by the time the services were terminated in the first. Thus the evangelists will remove to the second hall without the loss of a single day, and the demolition and reconstruction of the hall first used will be immediately commenced. It will be erected on the site selected for the third series of services, and will be completed by the time the evangelists close the second series. An effort will be made to prevent the attendance of people who may be desirous of following the evangelists from place to place. Tickets will be distributed in the immediate locality of the hall for the benefit of residents, and the holders will have the preference of admission.

The halls, as will be seen from the picture of one of them, are exceedingly plain and unpretentious in appearance, but they are well adapted for the purpose, and their acoustic qualities are excellent. They have seating accommodation for fifty-eight hundred persons. All around the hall appropriate texts are displayed.

The services commenced on Saturday, November 3d, with a united prayer-meeting. On the following day—Sunday—there was an early morning meeting for Christian workers at eight o'clock, for which no tickets were required. At eleven o'clock there was an ordinary evangelistic meeting, admission by ticket only. At three o'clock a meeting for women only, and at half-past six one for men only. Tickets were not required for either of these gatherings. Each week-night there is a meeting at eight o'clock, and Bible readings at three o'clock every afternoon excepting Monday and Saturday.

There is a general disposition on the part of clergymen of all denominations to assist in the great work, and thus indirectly much good is being done by drawing together Christian workers who do not often associate together. Lest the clergymen of the Episcopal Church should feel any diffidence in attending and assisting, the eminent bishop who took part in the recent convention in Philadelphia and who has often visited this country—Dr. Thorold, Bishop of Rochester—has written a letter to a London clergyman which has been published. In the course of the letter Dr. Thorold says: "I am sincerely glad that you should give counsel and sympathy to our good kinsmen, the American evangelists, who propose to help us with our overwhelming work in South London this winter. Their success will, moreover, be far more complete if you can show them how to reach that class of the population which I have reason to know they did not lay hold of in their last visit to the metropolis, and which, alas! still baffles the Church's activities, though not outside her duty, purpose, and care. May I add that these men are personally known to me. More than once I have come across their track in their own country, and have heard nothing but good of them. To call them schismatics is to trifle with language. To suspect them of sectarian motive is to do them a grave injustice. Their religious services are simple, reverent, and deeply impressive. Their recent labors, not only in our largest provincial towns, but also at our two great English Universities, are standing the hardest test, that of time. Should any one doubt if their doctrine is pure, or their work solid, let them do what I myself have done, and hope to do again, go to judge for himself. He will probably come away touched to the quick by the tenderness, pathos, and manly thoroughness of what he will hear there, perhaps just a little sorry that their secret is not yet quite his own. This I am sure about, that all earnest workers for souls, of whatever school among us, if they cannot altogether go with them, will pray for them. My own desire is that God will raise up ten thousand such men to proclaim redeeming love."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

The Evacuation Day Celebrations in New York last Monday, in which hundreds of thousands of people participated, were to many merely a pleasant holiday. In more thoughtful people, however, they awakened glorious and patriotic emotions. The recollection that just a century ago the last vestige of foreign dominion was swept away from this great country, and the emblem of foreign power was torn from the mast and replaced with the Stars and Stripes, as the British fleet sailed through the Narrows, is to a patriot a stirring memory. The descendants of those who fought so valiantly in the patriot army in that gallant struggle could best appreciate the full meaning of the centennial celebration. Yet it is strange that the proclamation of spiritual emancipation won for the world by Christ with His blood is often heard with listless ears by those for whom He won it, and they prefer to remain under the degrading tyranny of Satan (Isa. 61 : 1).

The Discovery of a Cave in a Mountain Stored with the proceeds of a series of burglaries has caused considerable excitement in a village in Westchester County, N. Y. A hunter observed a man entering a hole on the side of a hill, which is thickly wooded, and, being curious, he followed him. He found that the cavity was about six feet square, and had been made comfortable by artificial means. His suspicions were excited, and he gave information to the police, who arrested the man found in the cave, and forced him to disclose its contents. Behind large rocks fixed in the back of the cave spacious cavities were found, full of plate and valuables belonging to people whose houses have recently been robbed. The production of a rope with a noose at the end induced the man to open up the whole place, and led to the identification of a large amount of property by the owners. The burglar's apparently reputable life and the ingenuity with which he had constructed his hiding place doubtless encouraged him to hope that he would escape detection, but the whole bad scheme is now exposed and the criminal forced to disgorge his ill-gotten wealth. If we can imagine the agony of shame the burglar must have endured in the exposure, we can form some idea of the effect on impenitent sinners of the revelations of that day when every secret and hidden sin shall be brought to light (Rom. 2 : 16).

A Member of Napoleon's Old Guard Celebrated his ninety-sixth birthday in Philadelphia, on November 19th, by an entertainment of an association to which he belongs. He is a native of Nice, and enlisted in the French army in 1806. Being wounded in one of the battles fought when he was a mere recruit he was made a lieutenant, and after the overthrow of the Emperor Napoleon he followed "the Little Corporal" to his sad exile in St. Helena. Among the most precious of his possessions is his commission, a crumpled and faded parchment, on which the seal of the great Napoleon is still legible. He came to this country soon after the death of his imperial master. It is very natural for the faithful officer to be proud of the treasured relic of the famous emperor, though Napoleon was a man whose principles and policy good men regard with abhorrence. With how much better reason may the soldiers of the Prince of Peace prize their commission (II Timothy 1 : 11, 12).

A Man Almost a Centenarian Applied for naturalization papers in California on November 7th. He is an Irishman, who has passed his ninety-ninth birthday, but is anxious to become a citizen of the United States before he dies. He has a practical as well as a sentimental motive in applying for naturalization. Having settled on Government lands, at Camptonville, he wishes to perfect his title for the benefit of his heirs. It is believed that this is the first time the United States has received so venerable a citizen. Most men at that age would not think it worth the trouble to transfer their allegiance. Christian workers in urging aged men to give up the devil's service and become followers of Christ are often met with the objection, "I am too old to change now," yet they have more weighty reasons for changing than has the aged Irishman. Even ninety-nine years past are nothing compared with the duration of the eternal future before them (I Peter 4 : 3).

A FATAL HOLIDAY.

THE scene was a public park on the outskirts of a great city, from the dirty streets of which thousands of workingmen, taking advantage of a legal holiday, had come for recreation and a little fresh air. Of course, as with almost all places of amusement, the opportunities for innocent enjoyment are often abused, and much is done which is neither elevating nor refining. But that arises from the vulgar and depraved tastes of the vicious element, which exists among workingmen as it does among those who call themselves the "upper classes."

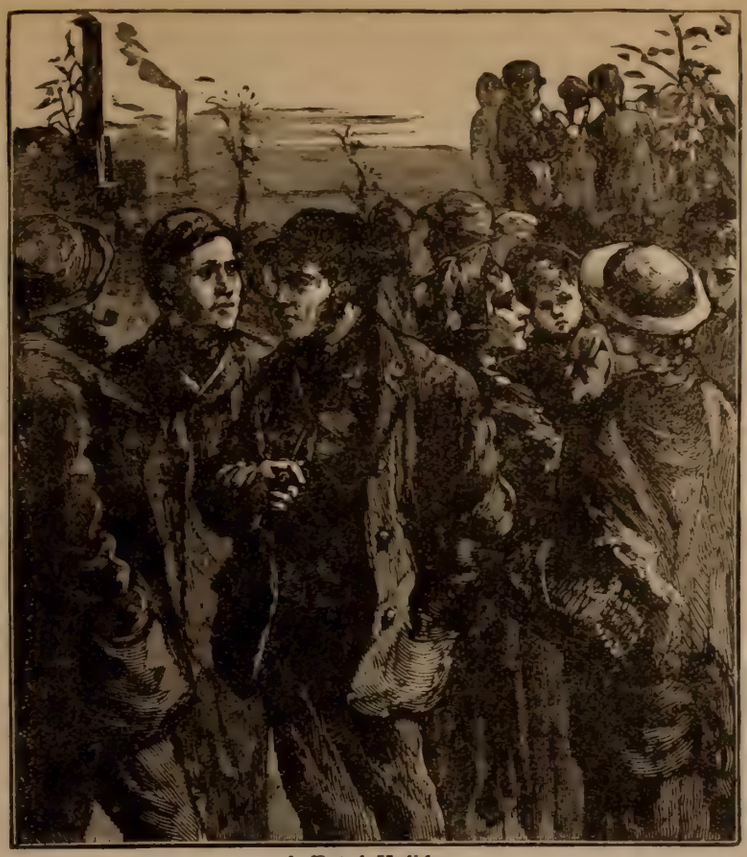
It was in the pleasant summer-time, and the park was densely crowded with men, women, and children, laughing, shouting, and singing, with that freedom and heartiness which only people whose holidays are few can really experience. Here and there, groups more boisterous than others in their jollity break out into awkward and grotesque movements meant to represent dancing. Men with pipes in mouth and hands in pocket jostle women with children in their arms. Not roughly, for childhood is always respected, nowhere more tenderly than among the poor. That is if they are sober; if they are drunkards, all the fine feelings of their nature are burned up by the scorching fluid, and woe betide the children dependent on their love!

Now and again a group of men, meeting others, would recognize city acquaintances and stay for a few words of greeting, a joke or two, perhaps, and good-humored raillery on each other's dress or personal appearance. Among these groups was one of three men clad unlike most of the others, in their working dress. One of these, looking back, said:



A Fatal Holiday.

"I say, Joe, look here! D'ye see who is behind us?"

"Not I," answered the man addressed, whose accent, dress, and fondness for the pipe showed that he, like his companions, was a recent importation from Europe. "I see no one I know," he said, taking his pipe for a moment from his mouth; "who is it?"

"Why, it's Fred. Fred Newton, and I declare he has got the missus and all the children!"

"Ah, that's the sort of chap he is, is it? Well, I never thought much of him on the other side, but since he has been here he's got to be a reg'lar milksop!"

"Shall we speak to him, Joe? Take a rise out of him, p'raps."

"By all means," answered Joe, sententiously, "anything for fun."

"Hullo, Fred!" shouted the first speaker, turning round and looking toward Newton and his family; "hullo! What are you doing here?"

"How do, Walker?" replied Newton, coming forward. "Glad to see you here; this is better than spending the day loafing around a bar in the city. Ah! Joe and Bill, too; enjoying yourselves, eh?"

"Tidy, mate, tidy," they answered with one voice, and Bill added, "Do you always take them along to look after you, to see you don't get to harm?" pointing jocularly to his family.

"Well, you see," explained Newton, "the wife needs a change as much as I do. She ain't afraid, bless you, of my going wrong, but she likes to be with me, and I like to have her. I ain't ashamed to bring my wife out, and we couldn't enjoy it if we did not have the little 'uns with us to enjoy it too."

"Lucky dog!" said Bill Reddin; "I can't afford to bring my missus. But then you see I ain't a teetotaler."

"Nor I," said Jem Walker; "and if I was I don't think I should come out with such a caravan as that. I get on better without 'em. They're best at home on a day like this, and we mean to have a good time before we go back, and they might be in the way, d'ye see? If you was anything of a man you'd leave the woman and children and come with us."

"Let the poor chap alone," exclaimed Joe, contemptuously; "let him alone. He can't help hisself. Come along, boys. Good-by, Newton."

Newton bade his fellow-workmen good-by, and returned to his own little family group. His wife noticed a slight cloud upon his brow, and took an early opportunity of asking its cause.

"Oh, it is nothing, Jane," said he, returning to his usual cheery manner, "nothing, only my mates chaffing me as usual about being a teetotaler."

"Well, well, never mind them, Fred. Never mind them. I am sure from their looks they need to be teeotal, or do something to improve their condition."

Fred took his wife's advice, and banished from his mind all thought about his fellow-workmen. The day sped all too swiftly for the little party, and when the evening came, and they had returned home cheered and strengthened by the day in the open air, Fred and his wife knelt together, while their children were grouped around, and thanked their heavenly Father for keeping them during the day from all harm.

While they were thus engaged a tragedy was taing place all unknown to them, which made the prayer Newton had uttered no meaningless formality.

Newton was up betimes in the morning, and off to his work. But, strangely enough, not one of the three companions he had met at the park the previous day turned up at the factory. The breakfast-hour came, then the dinner-hour, and, at last, evening, with its welcome relief from toil. As Newton walked home, he noticed crowds round the boys selling the evening papers, who were shouting out something about a "dreadful tragedy." He stopped, bought a paper, and, opening it, read with horror that, in a drunken brawl, Jem Walker had been mortally injured by his two companions, Reddin and Joe, who had been arrested. The report said, and Newton could easily believe it, that there appeared to have been no malice, for the men were evidently good friends. But there is a stage on the way to stupid intoxication in which a man becomes quarrelsome. Before he becomes senseless and sleepy he is apt to have a desire to quarrel and fight. Unhappily the three men had arrived at that stage at the same time, and a fight ensued in which Walker had received a fatal blow.

Newton visited the men the following day in the prison, and learned that they would probably be tried for manslaughter and escape the rope with a long term of imprisonment. Poor fellows! No men could be more sorry than they for the crime they had committed. But what sorrow can undo an act which had left a wife and children desolate, and had sent a fellow-creature into eternity unprepared for the great change? It is the knowledge that such cases are constantly occurring which nerves and strengthens those who are laboring for prohibition.

Euclid Robbed.

BLACKETT'S hatred and vengeance were no mean forces which Euclid could afford to forget or disregard. His enemy had him at an advantage, inasmuch as he could neither go in nor out of the house without passing the door of his room, where he might be lurking in ambush against him. Euclid was a peaceable, inoffensive old man, who had kept himself aloof from his neighbors in dread of falling into disturbances. It worried him to feel that he had made such a man his enemy, and at times he reflected on the possibility of moving; but Victoria's ill health and weakness seemed to make that impossible, even if he could find an equally cheap attic in the neighborhood.

He did not know it, nor did Victoria; but for some time past a rumor had pervaded the house that old Euclid, the water-cress seller, was a miser—a miser, also, of the old-fashioned type, who kept his money in hard cash, and in his own hands. Some of his neighbors said he carried untold wealth about with him in the old waistcoat which he always wore, summer and winter, under his linen blouse. Others guessed that every chink and crevice in the walls of his garret contained banknotes and coins, and that Victoria's constant ill health was nothing but a blind to account for her never leaving the treasure unguarded.

Both Euclid and Victoria became the objects of unusual attention; and Victoria, especially, was surprised and embarrassed by the friendly visits of her neighbors during her father's absence in the daytime, who came to offer her any assistance she needed. But Victoria was now quite independent. Bess made the bed, and scrubbed the floor, and did the little shopping that had to be done; and the sick girl had never been so comfortable and cared for in her life.

No doubt it was Bess herself who had innocently set these rumors afloat. No one can tell whether she had hinted at it in any confidential talk with Roger, or whether some prying neighbor, listening in the common entrance, had overheard her telling her mother of the wonderful sight she had beheld through the chink in old Euclid's door. Bess was too busy to hear anything of these whispered reports, and they were not likely to reach the ears of Euclid and Victoria. Neither of these ever spoke of their treasure in the presence of Bess, and Victoria always carefully removed it from under her pillow before Bess made the bed. It had not grown at all since Mrs. Fell's funeral day; nay, once it had been broken into to pay the rent. Yet neither of them repented befriending Bess.

One consequence of Bess living up in the garret was, that it became a not unusual circumstance for Roger Blackett to mount up there, partly for her sake, and partly to seek a refuge from his father's cruel tyranny. Blackett knew it very well, but, with a crafty foresight that this might be useful some day, feigned an utter ignorance of this new intercourse. Roger seldom showed his face when Euclid was at home; but Victoria soon grew used to seeing him creep in timidly, with his terrified, downcast face, and crouch on the hearth before the handful of fire, showing her the bruises on his arms and shoulders and back, where his father had been flogging him. He was an idler, weaker boy than David Fell, with less energy to swim against the tide of evil that was ready to sweep him away in its current. But as yet he had never fallen into the hands of the police; and now he promised Victoria, as he had been wont to promise Mrs. Fell, that he would always be a good boy, and keep from being a thief.

To Victoria it was pleasant to have this fresh young life of Bess and Roger coming about her to divert the dreary solitude of her illness. She had had no companionship except that of an old man borne down by cares; and Euclid was amazed to find how cheerful she grew, and how much less the winter was trying her than he had feared. The change, though he did not grudge Bess her home, was not so welcome to him as to Victoria. The mere fact that he could never speak of his own aim in life before Bess, nor count over his hoard as he had been used to do, made him more anxious about it; and he could not get the thought of it out of his head while he was away all day crying his cresses in the distant streets.

"Victoria, my dear," he said one evening, when he was home before Bess, and had treated himself to a hasty and furtive glance at his treasure, "I'm castin' about in my mind if we couldn't find a safer place for it, now we've so many strange folks about us. If I only knew somebody as 'ud take good care on it for us."

"It's never from under my pillow, father," answered Victoria, with a smile. "It's as safe as safe can be. Don't you fidget, daddy."

"If I could only lock the door when we go out i' th' mornin'," sighed old Euclid.

"And leave me locked up all day!" said Victoria, laughing.

"Bess has been with us four weeks," he went on, "and we haven't put a penny to it. And Blackett gives me a curse every time he catches sight on me."

"Father," she said earnestly, "I'd ten times rather be buried in a parish coffin than turn Bess away into the streets."

"Ay! so would I for myself, lass," he answered. "But it 'ud be hard work to me to follow thee in a parish coffin."

It was still as dark as midnight at four o'clock the next morning, when Euclid and Bess, after giving Victoria a cup of tea, left her to sleep away the remainder of the night until daybreak. Her best and soundest sleep generally came to her after they were gone, and she was alone in the quiet garret, past which no foot could tramp, and above which was the roof inhabited only by the sparrows.

If Euclid and Bess could have looked through the panels of Blackett's door as they passed it, they would have seen that he was up, and listening; and that Roger was cowering behind him, with a scared and haggard expression on his wretched face. In about a quarter of an hour after their departure, Roger was being pushed on by his father, with smothered threats and curses in his ears, up the dark staircases, and past the doors of the rooms, whose inmates would be all astir in another hour or less. Roger crept slowly and reluctantly up the last steep flight, and lingered a moment at Euclid's door, while Blackett stood half-way below him, a black figure in the deep gloom, beckoning to him with a threatening gesture to go onward.

Roger pushed the latchless door gently, and found that it was not fastened within, but yielded at once to his touch. The small fire of coals and wood, lit by Bess, had smouldered down, and showed only a line of red between two lowest bars; yet the faint light it gave fell upon the pale face of Victoria, already sleeping a quiet and restful slumber. He looked from that pale, sleeping face, back to the tall black figure in the darkness, with its uplifted and clinched fist menacing him, and he strode noiselessly into the room.

Still he paused for some minutes, dreading to go on, though not daring to go back. Victoria was kind and good to him; but his father was threatening to kill him if he did not execute his commands. Why had he ever learned that old Euclid was a miser, and had heaps of money? and, oh, how could it be that he had ever betrayed to his father the secret he had found out—that Victoria guarded some precious bundle under her pillow? If he must be a thief, he would a thousand times rather steal from any one than her.

A very slight, but to Roger a very terrible, sound upon the staircase, filled him with a sudden courage. He stretched himself on the floor, and crawled forward to Victoria's side. Very warily and softly his fingers stole up, and under her pillow, where the precious bundle lay. He drew it so slowly and gently toward him, that, though Victoria moved a little restlessly, and put her hand up sleepily as if to guard it, she did not wake. In a few moments it lay in his grasp, and he was crawling back across the floor to the dark staircase. The door creaked a little on its rusty hinges as he closed it after him; and he heard Victoria's voice calling out drowsily, "Good-by, father."

It was after midday before Victoria got up; for she was neither so hungry nor so cold in bed, and it saved firing to lie still as long as she could bear it. She had asked Roger the day before to come up for some pence to buy chips and coal, and he had promised readily to do it; but he did not come. She had just chips enough to kindle the fire, and sufficient coal to keep it alight till Bess or her father should come home. But she could not help wondering what cruelty of his father's was keeping him away, as she watched the tiny tongues of flame, which had to be carefully cherished lest they should die out altogether before the coal was lit.

She felt hopeful and happy. The late February days were come, and the sky was clearer; the dense fogs were almost gone for another spell of summer weather; and the clouds that still hung gray above the streets had gleams of blue breaking through them. The deepest misery of the year was over. The days were longer, and would soon be warmer. There was no dreary midwinter to tide over. Victoria, watching her small fire, not quite kindled yet, sang feebly to herself in a piping, tremulous voice; and her wan face wore a brighter smile than it had done for months.

"Why, there's father comin' up the stairs!" she exclaimed. "He's more than an hour early."

It was Euclid, who came in with an empty basket and a pleased face. He had had uncommon good luck, he said, as he sat down before the fire, and stretched his wrinkled old hands over the flame and smoke. He had been reckoning up as he came along home, and he could spare a coin or two to add to the hoard. Now Bess was away, and sure to be away for another hour or more, he could count the money over, and feast his eyes upon it—the only pleasure he had in the world.

"It does my old heart good, Victoria, my dear," he said, turning up the old soap-box on end. "It's as if it made up for all the pipes I never smoke, and the victuals I never eat, and the sights as I never see. Make the door fast, my dear, and you and me'll have a treat."

Victoria fastened the door with a forked stick, brought from the market, laughing a low, quiet laugh, in which Euclid joined hoarsely, yet heartily. It was as great a treat to him to hear her laugh as to count up his money.

"I've heerd a learned man—a great scholar he was," said Euclid, "as had read a heap o' books—talk o' bein' as rich as creases; but whatever he could ha' meant by it, I could never make out yet. I've puzzled over it many and many a hour. If he'd said as cold as creases, or yet as green as creases, I could ha' understood. But as rich as creases, Victoria, my dear!"

"Don't ask me, father," she answered, "I'm no scholar. We've lived on creases; but we've never got rich on 'em."

"Ay, we've lived and died on 'em," said Euclid contemplatively. "If we could have all the money as ever we spent, all that's gone in rent, and victuals and clothin' and ceterer, we might, maybe, ha' grown rich by creases; but then where should we ha' been?"

Victoria had lifted up her pillow as he spoke, half to himself and half to her. She stood for an instant gazing down in bewilderment. The old cotton handkerchief, once white with a red border round it, but grown yellow and dingy with age, and with much knotting and unknotting—the familiar little bundle that had been her father's purse ever since she could remember—did not lie in its accustomed place. She pushed aside the parcel of rags which served Bess as a pillow; but it was not there. She shook the clothes with a trembling hand, and then sank down on the bedstead, sick and faint with alarm.

"Father!" she breathed in a low, gasping voice, "it's gone!"

For a moment old Euclid gazed at her in a dreamy, absent manner, muttering, "As rich as creases!" as though he did not hear her speak.

"Father!" she cried again, in a louder tone, "our money's gone!"

"Gone!" he repeated.

"It's not here!" she answered. "It's been stolen! stolen! I remember now. There was a click of the door, after I'd fallen asleep, and I called out, 'Good-by, father!' and it was a thief! O father, father! what shall we do?"

Euclid had started to his feet, and stood trembling and shivering with the shock of terror. Gone! Stolen! The little hoard of money he had scraped together with so many hardships and cares, so much labor and self-denial! The money he might want, before the bleak winds of March were gone, to bury his last child in her own coffin. Was it possible that God would allow a thief to steal in, and rob him of such a sacred treasure? Euclid's heart answered, Yes, it was possible; it had come to pass, this overwhelming disaster, and his very soul seemed to die within him.

He sat down again in his broken old chair; for he felt too feeble to hold himself up, and he hid his withered, ashy-pale face in his hands. All the misery and privation and pinching poverty of his sixty years of life seemed to rush back upon him, and roll like a full tide over his crushed spirit. After all his toil and suffering, he would be forced to go upon the parish, if not to-day or this week, well, in a few weeks, or in a few months at the farthest. He might as well give up at once; for he could never save so much money again.

And Victoria! Now, if she should fall ill, even a little worse, she must be taken away from him, and go into the workhouse hospital, to die there, among strange bad women, uncared-for, weeping her last bitter tears on a parish pillow; while he, parted from her, was perhaps laying his old gray head on another parish pillow, and turning his face to the wall to hide his bitter tears.

"I must stir up," he said at last, rising stiffly and slowly from his chair, as if he felt himself to be a very old, infirm man: "I must fetch the police, Victoria."

It was not long before a policeman mounted up to Euclid's garret, and heard the whole story of the loss. Nor was it very long, after inquiring who visited them the oftenest, and after seeking a little information among the neighbors, who very eagerly supplied it, before he fixed upon Roger and his father, who bore the worst character in the house. Before an hour had passed, Roger was lodged in the nearest police-station, and Blackett was being sought for in all his usual places of resort.

But Blackett was nowhere to be found. He had taken his glazier's tools, and a sheet or two of glass on his back, and gone away into the country to seek for stray jobs in the shape of broken panes. There was no trace of the lost money in his room; and though Roger, in his fright, had owned to having stolen it, and added that he had given the whole of it to his father, there was no evidence to prove the truth of his assertion. Roger's terrified statements were full of contradictions and falsehoods. He was ready to assert or deny anything, and he was remanded until his father could be found and summoned; while Euclid and Victoria were bidden to hold themselves in readiness to appear whenever their evidence should be wanted.

DAVID'S FRIEND, JONATHAN.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 9, 1 Sam. 20 : 32-42. Golden Text, Prov. 18 : 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jonathan's Intercession with his Father—Saul's Oath—Not his Own Master—His Pursuit of David—Effect of a Spiritual Atmosphere—God's Mode of Working on His Enemies—Jonathan Incredulous of his Father's Duplicity—Painful Discoveries in the Christian's Life—Freedom in Real Love—A New Convenant with Jonathan—The Love Jesus Seeks—Power of Christian Equanimity—Sympathetic Friendship.

FROM the moment that David and Jonathan made a covenant together Jonathan never swerved from his devoted love to David. When Saul spoke to him and to his servants that they should slay David, Jonathan saved his life by sending him to hide, and by reasoning with his father Saul, and he so far prevailed that "Saul sware, As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain." So David was restored to favor until his military prowess in another encounter with the Philistines again roused the evil spirit in Saul, who attempted for the second time to murder him in the heat of his jealousy. "Without me ye can do nothing," said our blessed Lord (John 15 : 5); Saul had sworn that David should not be slain, but the Lord was departed from him, and the enemy who possessed him was more than a match for him; his intentions may have been very good, but in the time of temptation he was

NOT HIS OWN MASTER.

Saul could not say like David, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want" (Ps. 23 : 1). He pursued David to his own house, from which he escaped with the connivance of his wife Michal, Saul's daughter, and he came to Ramah, where the old prophet Samuel lived. Saul sought him even there, but the spiritual atmosphere of the place was such that Saul's messengers were affected by it. The company of prophets were prophesying, and Samuel standing as appointed over them, and the Spirit of the Lord which was upon them, came also upon the messengers of Saul, and they too prophesied. Saul's purpose, however, was not accomplished; so he came in person to "Naioth in Ramah; and the Spirit of God was upon him also, and he went on, and prophesied."

How wonderfully God works! The very man who came to Naioth, impelled by Satan to slay him whom the Lord had anointed king over Israel, was disarmed by the power of the Spirit of God which was in the place, and took hold upon him! Thank God this is no unusual case; again and again we have seen a very fury of anger or jealousy completely overthrown by a high-toned spiritual atmosphere, it cannot live out of its own element—self. Did Saul think of the first time he had come under this blessed influence, and had prophesied, when "God gave him another heart?" We know not; this, however, is clear, Saul never really yielded himself up to God in true repentance and confession, and thus his temporary coming under the power of the Spirit of God passed away without any definite result.

David fled thence and met with Jonathan, and pleaded with him, "What have I done? what is mine iniquity? and what is my sin before thy father, that he seeketh my life?" Jonathan was ignorant of the fact that his father had broken his oath to him; with a son's affection, he could not bear to think so badly of his parent, and he said to David, "God forbid; thou shalt not die: behold, my father will do nothing either great or small, but that he will shew it me; and why should my father hide this thing from me?" David knew Saul better, and he said, "Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes; and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved; but truly as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth,

THERE IS BUT A STEP BETWEEN ME AND DEATH."

Jonathan had relied upon his father's word, he was divided between loyalty to his friend and loyalty to his father. Oh, how many young Christians there are who cannot bring themselves to believe that a kind and loving mother is in reality an unsaved soul, or that a believing mother who urges them to take part in the vanities of the world is, after all, not consecrated to the Lord. Often in life we have to endure the painful shock of discovering that our friends and relations, and much more frequently that we ourselves are not all we thought; and we have to learn God's lesson, "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm."

David's eyes were fully open to his danger, but he wanted his friend to be undeceived, therefore he requested him to excuse his absence from the king's table on the morrow, when there would be the feast of the new moon, and that it should be a test by which Jonathan might discover what was the mind of his father toward David. If Saul should say, "It is well," then David's fear was unfounded; but if he was very wroth, then both would know that evil was determined against him. David spoke as though he was almost ready to doubt Jonathan, saying, "Deal kindly with thy servant; for thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord with thee; notwithstanding, if there be in me iniquity, slay me thyself; for why shouldest thou bring me to thy father?"

Jonathan could take anything from David, their friendship was unselfish, each one considered the other; we find none of that exacting love between them which we often meet with among Christians, where one exacts all the thoughts, attention, and occupation of the other, seeking to get personal gratification out of the other, and turning friendship into the most complete slavery.

REAL LOVE KNOWS NO BONDAGE;

where real love exists, all fear of offending or hurting another is taken away. When a real covenant of the Lord exists between two friends, all compulsion, all exaction ceases; it is just the Lord knitting together in Himself two of His members, whose only but perfect tie the one to the other is Himself.

Jonathan was not hurt by David's words, but he assured David that if he knew evil were determined against him, he would tell him. Thus David's love for his friend appeared. "Who shall tell me? or what if thy father answer thee roughly?" Jonathan was willing to bear his father's roughness for David's sake. But as David had made him the guardian of his life so he made David the guardian of his life, "Thou shalt not only while yet I live shew me the kindness of the Lord that I die not; but also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house forever." * Jonathan knew that David should reign, and although he himself was the heir apparent to the throne, no particle of jealousy could be discovered in his relations with his friend. "And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him; for he loved him as he loved his own soul."

* [David kept his oath. See II Samuel 9.]

Jesus calls His disciples "friends" (John 15 : 13-15). The world hates Jesus as Saul hated David, self in our own hearts usurps the place of Jesus as Saul did that of David. But our beloved Lord seeks from us love like that of Jonathan, which divests itself of all, makes all we are and all we have to be His; but which at the same time claims all; and that not for ourselves only, but for our seed, our children natural and spiritual. Jonathan made David swear again, and Jesus loves to have us put in a claim upon the faithfulness of His promise. "So Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David, saying, Let the Lord even require it at the hand of David's enemies."

A LOVE WHICH GIVES ALL,

They then agreed upon a sign by which David should know what was Saul's mind toward him. Jonathan would be in the field and shoot; if he should say to the lad who bore his arrows, "Behold, the arrows are beyond thee," then David should know that evil was determined against him by Saul. It was as David had said; Saul missed him from the feast, and in his anger bitterly reproached Jonathan for his choice of David, declaring that as long as the son of Jesse lived upon the ground Jonathan's kingdom should not be established. And when he inquired what David had done to deserve this anger Saul threw a javelin at him to smite him. God's king and man's king must be at enmity, God's government and man's; and sore indeed would be the position of such as Jonathan who are in the world, but whose hearts bow to the Lord's anointed, were it not for the covenant which exists between Jesus and them. But Jonathan was faithful, as faithful to David at court as he was when alone with him. And, thank God, in any position of life when there is a real surrender to Jesus, and He is allowed to reign and have His way, although the outward circumstances may seem to make a holy life impossible, the Lord will use all those circumstances to bring out the strength of the hidden relationship.

Between those two friends it was an understood thing that David was to reign, and even at court Jonathan said nothing against it, but maintained the cause of his friend Nothing has such power over worldlings as

THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST IN HIS PEOPLE.

When worldlings see the "friends" of Jesus full of calmness and cheerfulness when all goes wrong, when petty vexations occur, when a servant has left the rooms dirty, when a visitor who is come for no real purpose hinders most important work, if the child of God can speak quietly but encouragingly to the servant, and say to the visitor cheerfully, "The Lord's work needs me just now," they wonder and think, "These people are different from me."

On the third day of the feast Jonathan went out and shot as he had arranged, then sent the lad home, and "David arose out of a place toward the south, and fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times; and they kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded." Jonathan was at last fully undeceived about his father, and that father's treachery robbed him of his friend, yet his grief was not equal to David's. Jonathan had David's word to rely on, while David knew that his life was safe in the Lord's hands, but he loved to minister to Jonathan. Again David is a type of Jesus; none can feel as He does the affliction of His own people. "In all their affliction, He was afflicted" (Isa. 63 : 9). "And Jonathan said to David, Go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn both of us in the name of the Lord, saying, The Lord be between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed forever." If David went away, he had nevertheless his word to rest upon, just as it sometimes happens that we have not the same conscious enjoyment of the presence of Jesus, but His Word remains ever with us, and ever the same, "And he arose and departed; and Jonathan went into the city."

The Christian Herald for 1884.

THE editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a few words to say on behalf of the publishers, to the friends of the paper That is not an uncommon occurrence, as every week, with undeviating regularity, the two parties are brought into friendly, and as there is substantial reason to believe, profitable communication. But this week a subject is dwelt upon which is very seldom referred to in these columns. That subject is the journal itself.

First. There is an agreeable duty to perform. The circulation THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has attained during the comparatively short time it has been published in this country, is unparalleled in the history of religious journalism. That fact is remarkable, because the paper has been so little advertised and the army of canvassers it is generally thought necessary to the prosperity of a weekly journal to employ, has not been employed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Yet the readers of the paper have continued increasing in number year by year. The present circulation is therefore almost wholly due to the kind efforts of voluntary canvassers, who have introduced the paper to their friends. The sincere thanks of the publishers are due to them, and are hereby tendered.

Second. The friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be pleased to learn that God is using the paper in the work of converting souls and in strengthening, encouraging, and comforting His people. It is the conviction that the paper is being thus used, that has induced its friends to work in order to extend its influence. The year now drawing to a close has been in this way the most remarkable in the history of the paper. The hearts of all engaged on the paper have been gladdened by reading testimonies from every State of the Union, of the good it has been the means of doing. For these results the publishers claim no merit. They are, however, humbly thankful to God who has given to their efforts His blessing, without which the best efforts would have failed.

Third. It is possible that much more good may be done in the coming year. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as heretofore, will rely chiefly upon the efforts of its friends everywhere to extend its circulation. It depends upon them whether the growth of its subscription list shall continue and increase in regular progression. If every subscriber could secure one other subscriber—which would not be a difficult undertaking—the list would, of course, be doubled at once. But more than that might be done. It is not necessary to canvass; it is only necessary to show any number of the paper, and to say that it is a fair specimen of the other numbers. Those, too, who desire to do so, can have a bundle of back numbers for distribution by sending a postal card to the Manager; and a statement of terms will be sent to any one who will act as agent in his own locality.

Fourth. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue—God willing—in the future, the same work, on the same lines, as in the past. If it is possible by divine help to make it brighter, more interesting, and more useful than it has been, neither labor nor expense will be spared in the attempt, but there is no intention to abandon the general plan which God has blessed. It is intended that, as heretofore, every number shall contain:

I. The portrait and biography of some eminent person.

II. A verbatim report of the sermon Dr. Talmage preached on the Sunday morning immediately preceding the day on which the paper is issued.

III. An article expounding some portion of the prophecies of the Word of God.

IV. A series of short anecdotes and incidents furnished by evangelists and Christian workers in all parts of the world.

V. A new sermon by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, the eminent London preacher, which by a special arrangement with his publishers is sent in proof sheets to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the day before it is published in England.

VI. Pictures illustrating scenes of foreign missionary work, or passing events, or stories of a directly evangelistic influence.

VII. An exposition of the International Sunday-School lesson, written by Mrs. M. Baxter, for the assistance of teachers.

VIII. An instalment of a serial story free from sensationalism and distinctly religious in its tendency.

IX. A summary of the events of the week, viewed from a Christian point of view, giving information as to public matters of general interest and advocating general social and political reforms, and individual abstinence from intoxicating liquors.

This is a list of the chief and prominent features of each number, and, though there are generally other features, those above mentioned are never omitted. A journal adhering without deviation to that programme, and with no denominational bias, every Christian pastor may recommend to his congregation with confidence, and every Christian worker may usefully recommend to his friends. If those subscribers who have assisted in circulating THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the past will continue their efforts, and those who have hitherto neglected to introduce it, will now commence to show it and recommend it, and if all who read it will pray that God will bless it, the year 1884 will be a year of extended usefulness for the paper and the good it has been enabled to do in the past will be only the first fruits of an abundant harvest.

Below are a few extracts from a large number of letters containing similar testimonies, which have been recently received from subscribers in various States who bear witness of the good work the paper is doing in their respective localities.

Dr. Talmage writes: "I congratulate the Christian Herald on its widening field. The paper is full of compressed information, and bears evidence of having an especial mission. Mr. Fernie has proved his rare qualifications for this sphere of editorial work, and has displayed a unique faculty for spiritualizing ordinary events, which otherwise might pass without any significance."

The Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., writes: "For several years I have been a reader of the Christian Herald, and have enjoyed it. No man of sense critically approves all departments of any newspaper, whether edited by himself or another, but, with this abatement, I can cordially recommend the Christian Herald as bright, instructive, interesting, and trustworthy. It is remarkable for being timely. It does not give old news, nor uncertain news, nor useless news, nor wicked news, but much news that is interesting and instructive. Every week I send my copy away, sometimes to distant parts of the earth, believing it will do good."

The Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., of Boston, Mass., writes: "It would give me great pleasure to distribute copies of the Christian Herald in my congregation. I will call especial attention to them. I value the paper very highly, and am constantly recommending it."

From Australia. M. John Esler, of Stewart's Camp, Riverena Plains, N. S. W. Australia, writes: "I am a regular reader of your widely-circulated paper, which I get from New York by mail. I spend many happy hours in the loneliness of the Australian Bush reading its valuable pages. I should like to express my gratitude to its editor and to the writers whose articles it publishes. God grant the Christian Herald a still wider circulation, and bless it still more in the salvation of souls."

From China. The Rev J. N. Hayes, of Shanghai, China, in renewing his subscriptions, writes: "We enjoy your most excellent papers in our China home."

SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE, BART.

Celebration of his Hundredth Year—His Famous Philanthropies — His Family — Marriage and Successful Business Career—First Visit to Palestine—A Jewish Rabbi's Admission in New York—A Memorable Journey—Honored by his Queen—Mission to Russia—Hopes of Jewish Nationality—Public Labors.

ON November 8th there were celebrations in all parts of the world in honor of the distinguished philanthropist whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. On that day, according to Jewish reckoning, Sir Moses Montefiore entered on his hundredth year. He was really born in Leghorn on October 24th, 1784, but that day in the Jewish calendar being the 9th of Heshvan, which this year fell on November 8th, that day was regarded as the anniversary of his birth. It was not by his own race only that the anniversary was enthusiastically celebrated. Sir Moses has been a general philanthropist. His ears have been always open to the cry of his brethren in distress, but they have never been closed against appeals from Christians for philanthropic objects. He has given freely, in some cases lavishly, and has not hesitated to sacrifice personal ease and incur personal peril, if by doing so he could save others from danger or relieve the sufferings others endured. Such devotion is deservedly honored, and on his birthday telegrams, letters, and personal visits from distinguished personages proved how widely and how sincerely he is respected.

Dr. Kohler, the eminent Jewish Rabbi of New York, in preaching a sermon on the occasion, styled him the Peter Cooper of the Israelitish nation. This tribute is the more noteworthy because it came from a preacher of the Reformed school, against which Sir Moses Montefiore has waged relentless war. Sir Moses has no sympathy with the Reformers, who have renounced the dietary and ceremonial laws of Moses, and who have neither the expectation nor the desire to return to Palestine. Yet, in spite of this divergence of theological views, Dr. Kohler was warm in his eulogy. He said: "What won him the esteem of all who knew him, Jew or Gentile, was, beside his utmost integrity, his genial courtesy and friendliness. Owning a beautiful estate at East Cliff Lodge, near Ramsgate, he frequently found the Duchess of Kent with her daughter, the present Queen of England, walking in his pleasant park grounds. So he at once begged her to accept of him to give her admittance at all times without ceremony. There was hardly any charitable object brought to the notice of the public to which he is not a large and regular contributor. Frequent shipwrecks having occurred on the cliff near his residence, which opens a wide view upon the wide ocean, he at once devoted large sums to the relief of the unfortunate deprived of their supporters. Like Abraham's house, the East Cliff mansion was, and still is, open to every supplicant. Denial of help is unknown."

THE JEWISH PEABODY,

The Montefiores were of Italian descent, and made their first appearance in England, it is stated, not long after Manasseh-ben-Israel's eloquent intercession with Cromwell procured the re-admission of the Jews. From this period, also, the Jews date England's commercial prosperity, on the ground that they being then shut arbitrarily from arts, agriculture, and all professions, were compelled to concentrate their attention upon trade. Later, when the debarred professions were thrown open, they won successes in law, learning, art, and statesmanship, and members of the Montefiore family distinguished themselves in science and literature as well as in commerce.

Moses Montefiore received commercial training, and was admitted to membership in the Stock Exchange.

HIS MARRIAGE.

In 1812 he married Judith, daughter of L. B. Cohen, Esq.; and the sister of Judith united the Montefiore and Rothschild families by becoming the wife of Nathan Mayer Rothschild. In 1814 he was elected gabay or treasurer of the Portuguese synagogue, and in 1824 assisted in founding the Alliance Insurance Office, of which he was elected the first president, which position he has held to the present time—a period of sixty years. His integrity and courtesy have intrenched him in the esteem and friendship of all with whom he had dealings to an extraordinary degree.

His marriage, besides being a singularly happy one, showed his independence of mind and superiority to the prejudices which then prevailed. His family had joined, as immigrants from Italy usually did join, the Sephardim, or Spanish congregation. He, however, wedded an Ashkenazi, or German Jewess. The line of demarkation between the two "nations," as they were called, was then strongly marked; they had but recently agreed to meet together to assert their common interests as Jews in the Board of Deputies, and marriages between them were still infrequent. Judith, Lady Montefiore, was a person of singularly well cultivated mind, much industry, and literary attainments. She entertained for her husband, as may be seen from her interesting privately printed diaries of the journeys to the East which she undertook with him, the deepest admiration and affection. To her her husband bowed his head affectionately every Sabbath eve, as he recited in prayer the words from Proverbs, "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all." He loved her with a devotion rare in these days, and she gave him not only the ardent affection of a true wife, but cordially sympathized with him in the dominating principle of his life. To her he confided his hopes and plans, and from her he received wise counsel and encouragement, and when she died in 1862 he grieved as only great minds can grieve. He erected over her remains a monument, the facsimile of that erected in memory of Rachel "in the way of Ephrath which is Bethlehem;" he endowed a scholarship in her name at the Jews' Free School, and gave other generous testimony of his regret in the way she would herself have chosen.

The Montefiores prospered in business, their alliance with the Rothschilds assisting them materially in their enterprises. In 1840 Moses retired from the business, though his brother, Abraham, continued and realized a much larger fortune. Henceforward he and his wife, having no children, devoted their lives exclusively to philanthropic labors.

Prior to that, however, in the year 1827, they made their together, following the impulse not merely of piety and love for the spots so sacred to mankind, but also of generous sympathy with its unfortunate inhabitants, whom they desired to offer assistance. Without distinction of creed or blood they lavished their charity in large measure upon the people there. In 1837, when Syria was ravaged by earthquakes, pestilence and famine, the noble pair started a second time to the sacred land of their fathers, to minister to the relief of the poor sufferers and to distribute money among whomsoever applied in the various towns and districts. Nor was Sir Moses satisfied with mere momentary relief. He spared no efforts in examining into the condition of every household of the poor, and by drawing up accurate statistics, being desirous to elevate the general, social and material position of the Jews of the Holy Land. He wanted to lift them from a state of pauperism and wretchedness to independence.

Dr. Kohler, referring to this period, says: "Already he had conceived the plan of a Jewish colonization in Palestine. He went to the Viceroy of Egypt, generously offering him on behalf of the Jews a sum worth $5,000,000 as a fund to start a bank for the purpose of buying up the land and rendering the Jewish inhabitants a farming and industrial people. His offer was not accepted. The plan was not supported, but never given up by him or English Jews and their friends. You hear it re-echoed in 'Daniel Deronda.' Some say it formed the pet scheme of Lord Beaconsfield's 'Eastern politics.' It is again taken up and pursued by Lawrence Oliphant," and Dr. Kohler then made an admission, the force and significance of which, coming as it did from a Jewish Rabbi of the Reformed school, cannot be overestimated. He said: "Surely if the national hopes of the orthodox Jew for a restored Jewish Kingdom will, under the pressure of constantly repeated persecutions and ostracisms, in some shape or other be realized, and I am now inclined to believe in its possibility without infringing on the cosmopolitan Messianic mission of the Jewish people, Moses Montefiore was instrumental in laying the foundation."

A MEMORABLE JOURNEY

was that Sir Moses undertook to Damascus in 1840. A Roman Catholic priest had suddenly disappeared from Damascus, and the Jews were accused of having murdered him. Eight Jews were arrested and were subjected to torture of the most revolting character, to force a confession of guilt from them. One or two of them in their indescribable agony made a confession, but an investigation of their statements showed they were innocent, and had only accused themselves in the hope that they might be killed outright instead of enduring further suffering. Then sixty-four Jewish infants were seized, carried away from their mothers and kept on scanty fare, with the expectation that maternal love might wring from the distressed parents a confession. But it was useless, the Jews were innocent, and the authorities were devising other ingenious methods of torture, when Sir Moses Montefiore arrived in company with the distinguished French Jew, M. Crémieux, and by personal intercession induced the Pasha of Egypt to put an end to the horrible persecution.

On his return to London he was elected sheriff of London and Middlesex, and in this capacity was knighted by the queen on the occasion of her first visit to the city. He was subsequently raised to the rank of baronet, and the queen, the more strongly to mark her regard for him, granted him a privilege in connection with his escutcheon, which is regarded as exclusively the mark of the highest orders of the peerage.

From Alexandria the philanthropist went to Constantinople, where he had an audience with the Sultan of Turkey, and secured for the Jews of that country many concessions previously denied them. Only two years afterward Montefiore was again in Palestine. A terrible epidemic had broken out and the death rate was appalling. Sir Moses Montefiore found his brethren in abject misery without hospital or medical attendance. He immediately established a dispensary in Jerusalem with a supply of medicines, employed a physician and nurses to attend to the sick, and defrayed the entire cost out of his own pocket for three years until the health of the community was restored.

The year 1846 found Sir Moses Montefiore and his wife enduring the rigor of a Russian

WINTER IN ST. PETERSBURG.

As usual, it was the sufferings of his people that caused the journey. The semi-barbarous Czar Nicholas was engaged in persecuting the Jews, and had issued an edict, the effect of which would have been fatal to thousands of them, and would have consigned many thousands besides to abject poverty. Sir Moses interceded for them, and the charm of his manner, his disinterested sympathy, and his appeals to the Czar's clemency, procured a withdrawal of the edict. On his way back to England he visited the Jewish settlements in several countries, and cheered them by his sympathy and counsel.

In 1858 the Mortara case, which has become historic, agitated the Jewish community. The Mortaras were a Jewish family living at Bologna, then under the misgovernment of the Pope. They had a Roman Catholic nurse girl who, in-yet been made manifest, or seen, what or how glorious we shall be." No saint has ever yet been glorified, and, therefore, made fit for heaven, or to be presented before the Father and the holy angels, and when one is glorified and presented, at that same time all will be glorified together. This event is called the "manifestation of the sons of God." "For the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. 8 : 19).

(To be concluded.)

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Perfume from the Gutter.—At a Meeting in Cowcaddens, Glasgow, Mr. Lawson said: "Many years ago the people of Paris used to throw out the offal of fish and other garbage into the streets to be carted away as useless, but a clever man found out a way to extract from this filth a sweet scent, so pleasant and good that people are glad to buy it at a high price. This is an example of what men can do with vile materials; but God can do greater and mightier things with man than this, He can and will take the vilest person out of the mire and slime of sin's foul gutter, and make him glorious like His own Son by the transforming power of the Holy Spirit."

Prayer in a Wayside Inn.—At Cowcaddens the Rev. Mr. Carstairs said: "I have great faith in the power of prayer; I do not mean mere repetitions of certain words, but the true cry of the heart of man to God. There was one part of our work in South Africa which made me shrink and quiver. No report will ever be made about it, but it was such that we felt our own inability to undertake it unless we were very specially supported by God. After the deputation was arranged we met in a wayside inn, and knelt to ask God for wisdom to overcome this difficulty in the path of our duty. Two months after we were brought back to that same spot—the only place in all our journeyings which we re-visited—to return thanks to God for His marvellous answer to our pleading cry."

A Mother's Parting Gift.—Dr. Wallace Said: "I was standing in a railway-station waiting for my train, meanwhile watching the various scenes which took place around me. I saw an elderly lady with her son, a noble-looking youth, waiting for the train to start. The lad was starting for San Francisco. The instant before the train moved, the weeping mother rushed to the stand where books and flowers were sold; pulling out her purse she took from it a coin which she threw to the salesman, and snatching up a pure white lily, she hastened back to her boy, and handing him the flower, cried, while the tears choked her utterance, 'Willie, come back as pure as that!' She knew he was going into the midst of great temptations, and give him an emblem of what he ought to be. God would have us all to be like Christ, His own dear Son, the 'Lily of the valley.'"

A Devil's Castaway Saved.—Mr. Simpson said: "A poor degraded woman came into a meeting, something like this one, to wait till darkness fell, that she might unseen throw herself into the Clyde, and so end, as she thought, her miserable existence; but the Lord loved and was pitiful to this poor woman. Cast out as she was by Satan, whom she had served so faithfully all her life, and dressed in the regimentals of sin, the Lord Jesus had mercy upon her. She was induced to wait till the after-meeting, where I talked with her, and she was constrained by the Holy Spirit to put her trust in Him who never failed man yet. I arranged to meet her on the Sabbath in another meeting, but how to find her out of the two thousand five hundred assembled there was the question. I asked one of those in charge, 'Is so-and-so here?' 'Come this way, there she is.' A few seats away from where I stood, I saw her, but so changed! Her face was bright and clean; she had on the same old rags, but they were neatly arranged and clean. I went over the forms and asked, 'How is it with you to-night?' 'I am happy, sir. Jesus loves me, and I am trusting in Him.' She has continued trusting, and has never been disappointed since. Her life is full of sunshine and unspeakable joy."

The Children in the Coalhole.—Mr. Scroggie said: "I was conducting some meetings in Stockton-on-Tees, where I met a man who in bygone days was a great drunkard. This is what he told me: 'When you were here many years ago I attended one of your meetings, and the Spirit of God laid hold of me so that I was a changed man from that time. At night when I got home, my wife was cowering in a corner, and my children were hid in the coalhole. I asked my wife, "What's the matter?" "We thought you might be drunk, and beat us." "I'll never do that again," I said; "I've given my heart to Jesus." My wife straightened up and put her arms round my neck; the children came out of the coalhole, and I kissed them as a father ought. Now we are very happy together, and Jesus is the comfort of our hearts, and the joy of our home.'"

An Officer's Prayer while Drowning.—The Rev. Mr. Douglas said: "A man in the full enjoyment of health and vigor, an officer on board a ship sailing in the Pacific Ocean, fell overboard. Not being a swimmer, he was in great danger of being drowned before help could reach him. Just as he was sinking for the last time, he cried out, 'O God, save me for Christ's sake!' Then all sense of time went from him, and when he came to himself he was lying on the deck of his ship. He remembered his prayer, and his heart rose to God in gratitude for not only saving his body, but also his soul from death. In speaking about his conversion afterward, he said, 'I wasn't half a man till Jesus saved me. Jesus has made a man of me.' We are all formed to be temples of the living God, and unless we let Him fill our souls we are incomplete."

A Talk under a Tree.—Mr. Douglas Said: "When I was a student in the Edinburgh University, I was walking along with a friend in a park, and noticed a sickly, weary-looking man sitting under an old tree. I said to my friend, 'Come, let us talk with this man; he is ill and unhappy.' Going up to the man, I said, 'Friend, you seem unhappy; are you a Christian?' 'I don't believe that any one can tell that.' 'You mean to say that we don't know whether we are saved or not, till we die?' 'That's it.' 'I am a divinity student, and would never enter a pulpit unless I could tell something better than that. God says, "That He so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life" Do you believe that?' 'I do.' His face actually changed where he sat, so that he looked well again almost. After some more conversation, he said, 'Thank you, gentlemen, for speaking to me; though I was saucy at first, yet I was asking in my heart, "What must I do to be saved?"'"

A Passion for Saving Souls.—The Late Rev. W. Gebbie, parish minister of Dunlop, who died on August 2d, at the age of seventy-three, had what is commonly called a passion for "saving souls." In order to introduce the subject of personal religion to those whom he wished to converse with, he was in the habit of frequently thinking out a new plan of attack. He would sometimes begin by asking the unsuspecting listener, "Have you heard the news?" "No; what is it?" "Jesus Christ has died for the sins of the world." "Oh, that is no news." "Indeed, I am glad you know it, and hope you have accepted it personally." Another time he would startle the rough workman at his side, in the train or elsewhere, by asking, "Can you fight the devil?" "No," the workman would reply, "I can't." "Then," said Mr. Gebbie, "I hope you have got some One to fight him for you." "I am not sure of that," would grudgingly come as a reply, which gave the eager speaker the opportunity he longed for to sow the seed beside all waters. On still another occasion he would pose the quiet, thrifty-looking woman by his side by asking, in an earnest way, "Have you paid all your debts?" The indignant answer would be, "Of course I have," an answer which was at once followed by the quaint remark, "I mean your debts to God." After breakfast, he would sally down the town with a bundle of tracts in his pocket, addressing himself to all and sundry with wonderful tact and unfailing good-humor. To a group of workmen he would say, "Would you take a tract from an old man?" which at once put the roughest on his good behavior; while to children he was wonderfully fascinating, and would seek out his nicest picture-tracts to please them.

MESSRS. MOODY AND SANKEY IN IRELAND.

IN connection with Messrs. Moody and Sankey's recent visit to Limerick some testimony-meetings were held, at which the following are some of the testimonies given: A thick-set, somewhat rough-looking man of the artisan class, said: "I have sinned against God and man, and I am like one who has been

PLUCKED FROM THE JAWS OF HELL.

The first night I went to Mr. Moody's meeting I was very nearly persuaded, but I held on till the next night, when Mr. Moody's discourse convinced me very much. He spoke of the young man who complained of his feelings, and to whom he pointed out that it was not Noah's feelings that saved him, but the Ark. That went like an arrow to my heart; he was simply describing my own case. I said: 'Lord Jesus, here I am.' Immediately it seemed as if the devil whispered to me, 'If you tell anybody you are saved you will be a hypocrite.' I said, 'Get thee behind me, Satan.' This is the first time I have ever spoken about it; may God give me strength!"

A STURDY COUNTRYMAN, past middle life, said: "My dear friends, it is fifty years since I began to pray; but up to last night they were the prayers of a hypocrite. I was asking with my lips, but never with my heart. Last night, in this meeting, I could think of nothing but the beautiful words that fell from the lips of our young friends who testified for Christ. I was then led to accept my Saviour, and I trust He will keep me to the end. I have also the privilege of telling you that without any prompting my two sons here have done the same thing."

Then he called on his two sons—fine, handsome fellows of twenty or thereabouts—to rise and testify, and when they got up in succession, declaring that they had embraced the truth of the Gospel, the heart of the meeting was deeply touched. It was a scene over which the angels must have been hovering, ready "to carry the tidings home to the new Jerusalem."

Another young man said: "Mr. McGranahan showed me that if I came to God as my Father He would not turn me away. Satan came to me with his temptations before I got home, but as soon as I reached my room I threw myself on my knees and committed myself to my Saviour. I would say to every young man here, This is the only way of escape; get on your knees, and Satan is sure to go. He has not troubled me since, and I hope he never will."

"Indeed he will," said a more experienced brother sitting near by. Major Whittle backed up this remark: "Satan will trouble you, but then you have found out the way to defeat him. I remember when a boy I used to have some trouble at school, because another boy—an Irish boy, too—

WANTED TO THRASH ME.

I was afraid to go there. But I had a big brother who rather liked a scrimmage, and I felt safe when I was with him. That Irish boy always let me alone when my big brother was with me. So when you meet with temptation keep close to your big Elder Brother, the Lord Jesus Christ, and you always will be safe."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Democratic Caucus of Members of the House assembled in Washington on Saturday, and chose Mr. John Griffin Carlisle, of Kentucky, as the candidate of the party for the Speakership of the Forty-eighth Congress. The caucus, after some preliminary debate on the question of ballot or open voting, proceeded to the nomination of candidates, and Mr. Carlisle was nominated on the first ballot. The numbers stood Carlisle 104; Randall 52; Cox 32. Of Mr. Carlisle's supporters, twenty-one were from the West and seventy-one from the South. New York divided its vote between Mr. Randall and Mr. Cox. While the choice of Mr. Carlisle is hailed with satisfaction by a large and influential section of the Democratic Party, another section does not conceal its regret. The latter section, indeed, apprehends that it will materially injure Democratic prospects in 1884. Mr. Carlisle is styled "a moderate revenue reformer," and it is expected that he will so frame the committees as to bring before the House a reduction of the tariff. His doing so will go far toward making the question of protection or free trade the main issue in the Presidential election.

One of the Most Important of the Annual Reports is that of the Secretary of the Interior. It will receive close attention on account of the interest excited by the progress of the Indian schools. Secretary Teller reports that although the appropriations last year for the education of Indians were, in his opinion, far below the actual wants of the service, great progress was made. Ten new day schools have been established during the fiscal year. The capacity of the boarding schools now in existence, including Carlisle, Hampton, and Forest Grove, is 5025, and the capacity of the day schools 4000, making a total of 9025. The capacity of boarding and day schools, old and new, is about 11,000 persons. The idea of placing at least one half of the Indian children in labor schools is again recommended by the secretary. The total expense of the Indian service, it is stated, cannot be less than $5,500,000 annually. Secretary Teller expresses his belief that it is possible, "with a wise and judicious treatment of the Indian question, to prevent the recurrence of hostilities between the Indian and his white neighbors that have marked nearly every year of our history." If the Indian is to become a civilized being, says the secretary, it must be by the aid of the Government, intelligently directed, and one of the first steps is to fix the Indian in a permanent home. To this end, the reservation should be reduced in size commensurate with the wants of their occupants, and a fee-simple title thereto given to the tribe, to be held for the benefit of the members, according to Indian polity, until such time as the Indians themselves shall choose to divide it. The surplus lands of such reservations should be bought by the Government and parcelled out to actual settlers only. The proceeds of the land so sold should be used, not in providing food only for the Indians, but in the purchase of stock, farming implements, and in the education of their youth. "The Indian must be taught to labor and care for himself, by persuasion if possible, by compulsion, if necessary."

The Record of the Foreign Commerce of the United States during the past year is summarized in a report issued by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics. From this it appears that the total amount was larger than for any year in the history of the country. The list of exports includes the following noteworthy items: Cotton, $247,328,721; breadstuffs, $208,040,850; provisions, $107,388,287; tobacco, $22,095,229; mineral oils, $44,913,079. These five items alone make up an aggregate of $629,766,166, which exceeds the value of the same products exported the previous year by nearly fifty-four million dollars. The exports of manufactures do not show a like increase. They amount to $111,890,000, which is but slightly in excess of the total of the previous year. The total exports of all kinds during the past year exceeded the total imports by more than one hundred million dollars.

A Very Significant Suggestion is Made by the Attorney-General in his annual report. Among several matters obviously suggested by the Government failure in the Star Route trials is that of the constitution of juries in the trials of Government officers. Mr. Brewster believes such trials should not be by an ordinary Washington jury. The report describes the influences that protect wealthy defendants in the District of Columbia, and enable them to escape punishment. The Government should be allowed, it is said, to secure a change of venue or to go to trial before a special or struck jury. Mr. Brewster suggests that the desired end may be attained by providing that the United States courts of Maryland shall have original jurisdiction over all crimes committed in the District of Columbia that are offences against the general laws of the United States, so that trials may be conducted in Maryland before juries drawn from the people of that State.

The Supreme Court of Florida has Affirmed the constitutionality of the recent enactment forbidding licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, except upon a petition of a majority of the voters of the election district. The people in any election district of the State will in future be able to declare absolute prohibition if they choose.

Thanksgiving-Day this Year was Marked in New York by a more extensive effort to render it enjoyable to the poor than in any former year. Large numbers of destitute people were gathered at the Bowery Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Five Points Mission, the Newboys' Home, the Howard Mission, the Home for the Friendless, and other missions, where, by the liberality of philanthropists, a good dinner was provided. One of the most interesting gatherings was in a ferry-house on the eastern side of the city, where Dr. Kennion has been laboring during the past year in the cause of Gospel Temperance. A rough board table and benches were placed in the store-room of the ferry-house, and provisions consisting of bread, turkey, pie and coffee, were spread before each place. A number of ladies and gentlemen had gathered at the head of the room. Dr. Kennion distributed the tickets to the impatient crowd outside, recognizing all who had signed the pledge or who were connected with the mission. The men supplied with tickets were admitted in groups of thirty, and after a blessing had been asked they attacked the provisions vigorously. Several selections from the Scriptures were read, and hymns were sung by the visitors.

The Rev. John S. Inskip, whose Paralytic seizure was mentioned recently in these columns, is gradually recovering from the attack. In a letter to a contemporary Mrs. Inskip states that her husband is now able to walk about his house and garden. He was able to attend a meeting of the National Camp-Meeting Association in Philadelphia last week, and is fully conscious, though able to talk but little. His entire restoration is possible in time, if he is careful, and if arrangements are made to assist him in his work. His unexpected presence incited thanksgiving and deep feeling among his associates.

Sojourner Truth, the Well-known Colored lecturer, died on November 26th at Battle Creek, Mich. She believed herself to be a hundred and eight years old. It is known that she was born a slave in Ulster County, New York, and had arrived at maturity when slavery was abolished in the State in 1817. She spent the remainder of her life in lecturing and preaching, and was enabled by the blessing of God to lead a large number of the most depraved of her own race to the Saviour.

Mr. W. Forbes, of London, England, who has been giving addresses in various parts of Canada and the United States, was in New York for two days last week. On one evening he delivered an address at the York Street Church, Brooklyn, at the request of Mr. Francis Murphy, who is conducting special services there. The following evening Mr. Forbes accepted an invitation from the Rev. George F. Pentecost to speak in the Tompkins Avenue Church. On both occasions he delivered a soul-stirring and deeply interesting address, which was listened to with close attention. He is this week holding evangelistic meetings in Philadelphia, and next Sunday he has, at the request of the Tompkins Avenue Church, arranged to commence a series of Gospel services at the Ellery Street Mission, Brooklyn, which was founded and is supported by Mr. Pentecost's congregation. Mr. Forbes's visit to this country is drawing to a close. It has been fruitful of spiritual blessing in many cities. Wherever Mr. Forbes has gone his apparently inexhaustible store of anecdotes, his apt illustrations, and his stirring appeals have rendered his services memorable in the churches. His letters may continue to be sent to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Rapid Increase in the Number of Divorces granted in recent years is causing alarm in all quarters where men are concerned for the moral welfare of the country. In the course of a lengthy examination of the subjects ome weighty opinions have been uttered by Judge Barrett of the Supreme Court, who is noted for his caution in granting divorces. One of the causes of the frequency of divorce, which he believes should be removed, is that of juvenile marriages. Speaking of marriage as a civil contract, he said: "Nowhere can a minor enter into any other contract that will bind him to the extent of sixpence. But as soon as a boy and girl have arrived at the age of fourteen years, the law allows them to enter into this most important of all contracts, without any restraint or conditions, and makes it perpetually binding upon them. If they discover their mistake and find that a continuance of their union means perpetual unhappiness, there is no relief for either of them but the divorce court." The judge believes that much good may be done by making the marriage ceremony more formal and solemn than it now is, especially in New York, where people may be married without any ceremony at all. He also strongly urged united and harmonious action of all the States in passing a uniform divorce law.

Mr. Francis Murphy's Temperance Revival work in Brooklyn is proceeding with remarkable success. More than a thousand persons signed the pledge during the week he was at the Hanson Place Church. Last week he was at the York Street M. E. Church, and this week he is holding meetings in the Nostrand Avenue M. E. Church. One of the most gratifying features of the movement is the reclamation of a large number of dissipated men, whose slavery to alcohol had brought their families to the verge of destitution.

A Strange Spectacle in the Sky was Witnessed on several evenings last week all over the country. It is mentioned in the journals of Eastern, Western, and Southern cities. Soon after the sunset gun was heard, the western sky was all aglow with a rosy tint, which deepened as darkness came on. Tongues of fire seemed to be curling upward all over the south-western horizon. In many cities, especially on the eastern coast, it was believed that an extensive conflagration was in progress, and in several places experienced firemen turned out in readiness for the summons momentarily expected, and telegrams were despatched inquiring the locality of "the great fire." The illumination continued for more than an hour. Several explanations have been put forward by scientists, but none of them satisfactorily account for the phenomenon. Professor Brooks expresses his belief that it is caused by large quantities of meteoric dust in the air, or that the world is passing through the tail of a comet. The appearance has caused much comment, and while it is doubtless susceptible of scientific explanation, the student of prophecy is reminded by the astonishment produced, that our Saviour specially mentioned "wonders in the heavens" as one of the signs that would indicate to the waiting believer the nearness of His coming (Luke 21 : 25.)

A Sailor's Ill-Luck, as Described by Himself, reveals a glaring want of perception of mercy. Dr. Dowknott, of the Medical Mission in New York, recently related the incident at a public meeting. A seafaring man had come to him for medical help on account of a wounded hand. The injury had been sustained in reaching shore from a wrecked vessel. Its owner appeared to be without any sense of gratitude to God for his spared life. Indeed, he was loud in his complaints of what he called his "ill-luck." Three times within little more than a year he had escaped in time of disaster at sea, lives being lost in every instance, and in the last instance he was washed ashore with the injury already mentioned. After hearing his recital of narrow escapes the missionary asked him if after all this he was not conscious of God's great mercy to him in thus sparing his life, and he appeared oblivious of all except his injury. Ultimately, however, by the blessing of God he was led to the Saviour. He is not the only man whose perception of trouble is keener than his perception of mercy.

Deadly Wires are, it is Averred, Suspended in the streets of many of our cities. Last week a runaway horse threw a coupé against an electric light pole in New York, and breaking it the wire fell in the street. Another coupé came up soon after, and the horse stepped on the wire. He instantly got a shock that lifted him off his feet, and he fell on the wire, and could not be moved by several persons who attempted to do so The driver caught hold of the animal's head and harness, and received a shock that upset him, and two or three bystanders who tried to lend assistance had some unpleasant experiences of electricity that they are not likely soon to forget. At length the wire was cut, and after a while the horse was able to regain his feet and was led slowly to the stables. The animal was apparently very weak, being just about able to stand. The driver is still confined to his bed. An expert in electric lighting states that the light wires are exceedingly dangerous, and that for a man to handle one of them, under certain circumstances, would inevitably cause his death. An effort is now being made to compel the companies to put the wires underground, and until that is done people will be very careful how they come in contact with them. They have need to exercise similar caution in dealing with sceptical scientists who, while pretending to give light to the world, carry spiritual death in their train (1 Tim. 6 : 20, 21).

A Tornado-Proof House has been Erected in Minnesota. The frequent recurrence of cyclones in that State, involving the destruction of all the houses in the path of the storm and sometimes causing the death of the inmates, has suggested to a wealthy Minnesota man the building of a house which shall be tornado-proof. The one he has erected has its corners acute and its sides sink into retreating angles. The roof has curves and grooves like a shell, and the walls are thickest below, and almost like those of a fortress. The whole structure is anchored, and the seams in its woodwork run in oblique lines. It may be hoped that the man whose foresight has prompted him to provide, like the man Christ described, for material storms has also led him to make provision against eternal disaster (Matt. 7 : 24, 25).

A Nap that Cost $500 was Enjoyed by the captain of a ship which arrived in San Francisco on November 19th. Late that night a British ship from Honolulu was sighted, and she was boarded by the customs officer, who asked for the ship's manifest. The captain had retired to rest, and on the Custom House officer awaking him he became indignant, denounced the intrusion as "Yankee impudence," and bade the intruder come around in the morning. He finished his sleep in peace, but the next day he was arrested and fined $500 for entering the dock without presenting his manifest. It was probably the most costly sleep that captain ever enjoyed, and he doubtless deeply regrets his somnolency. There are many men similarly disposed sailing life's voyage. We hope they are Christians, but they are too sleepy to show by their lives what they are. Jesus warned all such of their danger (Mark 13 : 35, 36).

The Discovery of Two Graves at Plymouth, Mass. recently, recalls a pathetic incident in the lives of the Mayflower pilgrims. It will be remembered that in the records of the colony it is stated that so many men died the first winter that it was deemed prudent to conceal the number of graves by levelling and sowing corn upon them lest the Indians, learning the weakness of the colony, should attack it. In making improvements on Cole's Hill, two graves have been discovered. One was opened on November 27th, and was found to contain the skeleton of a middle-aged man, five feet nine inches in height. In another grave the skeleton of an elderly man was discovered. These are the only graves of the first settlers which have been positively identified. Tablets will be placed to mark the exact spot. They are the graves of brave, God-fearing men, whose memory will never be forgotten (Prov. 10 : 7).

A Shower of Snails Startled the Citizens of Hartford, Conn., on November 25th. A despatch from that city says : "Millions of minute shining snails, each encased in its own little spiral and shining shell, came down upon the west part of Hartford, falling visibly through the sunshine, and by their appearance giving to some beholders the impression that it was snowing. This snail-shower appears to have extended over a space perhaps half a mile square. The sidewalks were covered with the shining little creatures. They are very small, unlike any American snail—though they may be known to the scientists—and in size are not half as large as a pea. They were alive, most of them, and thousands survived the ensuing cold weather for several days. Where they came from is a question no one as yet has been able to answer." It is supposed that being so exceedingly light and frail they must have been dislodged and carried away by the high wind that was blowing. The Psalmist, describing the destruction of the wicked, uses an illustration of which this incident is a parallel (Psa. 58 : 8, 9).

A LUTHER SERMON AT THE TABERNACLE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But the just shall live by his faith."—HABAKKUK 2 : 4.

Luther a Hero and a Saint—The Gospel of Habakkuk—The Same Gospel—I. A Man of Faith a Just Man—Just in the Gospel Sense—Righteousness Counted to Him—Impelled to the Right—II. A Just Man has Faith—Lack of Faith an Injustice—Outward Purity Insufficient—Responsibility of Belief—A Murderer's Statement—III. By Faith the Just Man Shall Live—A Narrow Statement—No Other Way to Live—A Broad Statement—The Way of Life all Through—An Unqualified Statement—Suggestive—Life in its Lowest Sense—In its Highest Sense—Includes Strength—Incidents of Luther's Life—Forced to Live by Faith.

THIS text is three times employed by the Apostle Paul as an argument. Read Romans 1 : 17, Galatians 3 : 11, and Hebrews 10 : 38 ; in each of these cases it runs, "The just shall live by faith." This is the old original text to which the apostle referred when he said, "As it is written, The just shall live by faith." We are not wrong in making the inspiration of the Old Testament to be as important as that of the New ; for the truth of the Gospel must stand or fall with that of the prophets of the old dispensation. The Bible is one and indivisible, and you cannot question the first Testament and retain the New. Habakkuk must be inspired, or Paul writes nonsense.

Yesterday, four hundred years ago, there came into this wicked world the son of a miner, or refiner of metals, who was to do no little toward undermining the Papacy and refining the Church. The name of that babe was Martin Luther.

A HERO AND A SAINT.

Blessed was that day above all the days of the century which it honored, for it bestowed a blessing on all succeeding ages, through "the monk that shook the world." His brave spirit overturned the tyranny of error which had so long held nations in bondage. All human history since then has been more or less affected by the birth of that marvellous boy. He was not an absolutely perfect man ; we neither indorse all that he said nor admire all that he did ; but he was a man upon whose like men's eyes shall seldom rest, a mighty judge in Israel, a kingly servant of the Lord. We ought oftener to pray to God to send us men—men of God, men of power.

I wish to take my little share in commemorating Luther's birthday, and I think I can do no better than use the key of truth by which Luther unlocked the dungeons of the human mind, and set bondaged hearts at liberty. That golden key lies in the truth briefly contained in the text before us—"The just shall live by his faith."

Are you not a little surprised to find such a clear Gospel passage in Habakkuk ; to discover in that ancient prophet an explicit statement which Paul can use as a ready argument against the opponents of justification by faith? It shows that the cardinal doctrine of the Gospel is no new-fangled notion ; assuredly it is not a novel dogma invented by Luther, nor even a truth which was first taught by Paul. This fact has been established in all ages, and, therefore, here we find it among the ancient things, a lamp to cheer the darkness which hung over Israel before the coming of the Lord.

Let us now examine this text, which was the means of enlightening the heart of Luther, as I shall tell you by and by.

I. I shall in the outset make a brief observation upon it ; a man who has faith in God is just. "The just shall live by his faith ;" the man who possesses faith in God is his faith is his life as a just man. He is "just" in the Gospel sense, namely, that having the faith which God prescribes as the way of salvation, he is by his faith justified in the sight of God. In the Old Testament (Gen. 15 : 6) we are told concerning Abraham that "he believed in the Lord; and He counted it to Him for righteousness." This is the universal plan of justification. He who makes the life and death of God's great propitiation to be his sole reliance and confidence is justified in the sight of God, and is written down among the just by the Lord Himself. His faith is imputed to him for righteousness, because his faith grasps the righteousness of God in Christ Jesus.

But the believer is also just in another sense, which the outside world better appreciates, though it is not more valuable than the former. The man who believes in God becomes by that faith moved to everything that is right, and good, and true. His faith in God rectifies his mind, and makes him just. In judgment, in desire, in aspiration, in heart, he is just. His sin has been forgiven him freely, and now, in the hour of temptation, he cries, "How then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" He believes in the blood-shedding which God has provided for the cleansing of sin, and, being washed therein, he cannot choose to defile himself again.

II. Upon that observation, which is vital to the text, I dwell no longer, but advance to another which is the converse of it, namely, that in God. Else, let me say, he were not just; for God deserves faith, and he who robs Him of it is not just. God is so true that to doubt Him is an injustice; He is so faithful that to distrust Him is to wrong Him—and he who does the Lord such an injustice is not a just man. A just man must first be just with the greatest of all beings. It would be idle for him to be just to his fellow-creatures only; if he did a wilful injustice to God, I say he would be unworthy of the name of just. Faith is what the Lord justly deserves to receive from his creatures. A truly just man must, believe in God, and in all that He has revealed.

Some dream that this matter of justness only concerns the outer life, and does not touch man's belief. I say not so; righteousness concerns the inner parts of a man, the central region of his manhood; and truly just men desire to be made clean in the secret parts, and in the hidden parts they would know wisdom. Is it not so? We hear it continually asserted that the understanding and the belief constitute a province exempt from the jurisdiction of God. Is it indeed true that I may believe what I like without being accountable to God for my belief? No, my brethren; no single part of our manhood is beyond the range of the divine law. To say that the rightness of the outward life sufficeth is to go clean contrary to the whole tenor of the Word of God. I am as much bound to serve God with my mind as with my heart. I am as much bound to believe what God reveals as I am to do what God enjoins.

I see not also, my dear friends, what reason there is for a man to be just toward his fellow-men when he has given up his belief in God. If it comes to a pinch, and a man can deliver himself by a piece of dishonesty, why should he not be dishonest if there be no higher law than that which his fellow-men have made, no judgment-seat, no Judge, and no hereafter? A few weeks ago a man deliberately killed his employer, who had offended him, and as he gave himself up to the police, he said that he was not in the least degree afraid nor ashamed of what he had done. He admitted the murder, and owned that he knew the consequences very well; he expected to suffer about half a minute's pain upon the gallows, and then there would be an end of him, and he was quite prepared for that. He spoke and acted in consistency with his belief or his non-belief; and truly there is no form of crime but what becomes logical and legitimate if you take away from man faith in God and the hereafter. That gone, break up your commonwealth; there is nothing to hold humanity together; for without a God the moral government of the universe has ceased, and anarchy is the natural state of things.

III. But now I come to the point upon which I mean to dwell. Thirdly, by this faith

THE JUST MAN SHALL LIVE.

This is at the outset a narrow statement; it cuts off many pretended ways of living by saying, "The just shall live by faith." This sentence savors of the strait gate which standeth at the head of the way—the narrow way which leadeth into life eternal. At one blow this ends all claims of righteousness apart from one mode of life. You must come right out from confidence in everything that you are or hope to be. You must tear off the leprous garment of legal righteousness, and part with self in any and every form. Self-reliance as to the things of religion will be found to be self-destruction; you must rest in God as He is revealed in His Son Jesus Christ, and there alone. The just shall live by faith; but those who look to the works of the law are under the curse, and cannot live before God.

The same is also true of those who endeavor to live by sense or feeling. They judge God by what they see; if He is bountful to them in providence, He is a good God; if they are poor, they have nothing good to say of Him, for they measure Him by what they feel, and taste, and see. If God works steadily to a purpose, and they can see His purpose, they commend His wisdom; but when they either cannot see the purpose, or cannot understand the way by which the Lord is working unto it, straightway they judge Him to be unwise.

LIVING BY SENSE

turns out to be a senseless mode of life, bringing death to all comfort and hope.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust Him for His grace," for only by such trust can a just man live.

The text also cuts off all idea of living by mere intellect. Too many say, "I am my own guide, I shall make doctrines for myself, and I shall shift them and shape them according to my own devices." Such a way is death to the spirit. To be abreast of the times is to be an enemy to God. The way of life is to believe what God has taught, especially to believe in Him whom God has set forth to be a propitiation for sin; for that is making God to be everything and ourselves nothing. The same is equally true of fancy. We often meet with a fanciful religion in which people trust to impulses, to dreams, to noises, and mystic things which they imagine they have seen; fiddle-faddle all of it, and yet they are quite wrapped up in it. I pray that you may cast out this chaffy stuff, there is no food for the spirit in it. The life of my soul lies not in what I think, or what I fancy, or what I imagine, or what I enjoy of fine feeling, but only in that which faith apprehends to be the Word of God.

But, secondly, this is

A VERY BROAD STATEMENT.

Much is comprehended in the saying—"the just shall live by his faith." It does not say what part of his life hangs on his believing, or what phase of his life best proves his believing; it comprehends the beginning, continuance, increase, and perfecting of spiritual life as being all by faith. Observe that the text means that the moment a man believes he begins to live in the sight of God; he trusts his God, he accepts God's revelation of Himself, he confides, reposes, leans upon his Saviour, and that moment he becomes a spiritually living man, quickened with spiritual life by God the Holy Ghost. All his existence before that belief was but a form of death; when he comes to trust in God he enters upon eternal life, and is born from above.

Yes, but that is not all, nor half; for if that man is to continue living before God, if he is to hold on his way in holiness, his perseverance must be the result of continued faith. The faith which saves is not one single act done and ended on a certain day; it is an act continued and persevered in throughout the entire life of man. The just not only commences to live by his faith, but he continues to live by his faith; he does not begin in the spirit and end in the flesh, nor go so far by grace, and the rest of the way by the works of the law. Faith is essential all along; every day and all the day, in all things. Our natural life begins by breathing, and it must be continued by breathing; what the breath is to the body, that is faith to the soul.

The same door by which life came in at the first is that by which life continues to enter. If any man saith to me, "I once lived by believing in Christ; but I have now and therefore I have no longer any need to look as a sinner to the blood and righteousness of Christ;" I tell that man that he has need to learn the first principles of the faith. I warn him that he has drawn back from the faith; for he who is justified by the law, or in any other way beside the righteousness of Christ, has fallen from grace, and left the only ground upon which a soul can be accepted with God. Ay, up to heaven's gate there is no staff for us to lean upon but faith in the ever-blessed Saviour and His divine atonement.

I beg you to notice, in the third place, what a very unqualified statement it is. "The just shall live by his faith." Then, if a man have but a little faith, he shall live; and if he be greatly just, he shall still live by faith. Many a just man has come no further than striving after holiness, but he is justified by his faith; his faith is trembling and struggling, and his frequent prayer is, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief;" yet his faith has made him a just man. Sometimes he is afraid that he has no faith at all; and when he has deep depression of spirits, it is as much as he can do to keep his head above water; but even then his faith justifies him. I do not say that little faith will give us the strong, and vigorous, and lion-like life which Luther had; but we shall live. The statement makes no distinction between this and that degree of faith, but lays it down still as an unquestionable truth, "the just shall live by faith." Blessed be God, then, I shall live, for I do believe in the Lord Jesus as my Saviour and my all. Do you not also believe in Him?

Ay, and is it not singular that this unqualified statement should not mention any other grace, as helping to make up the ground on which a just man lives? "The just shall live by his faith;" but has he not love, has he not zeal, has he not patience, has he not hope, has he not humility, has he not holiness? Oh, yes, he has all these, and he lives in them, but he does not live by them, because none of these so intimately connects him with Christ as does his faith. Other graces are needful, but faith is the life of them all. We do not undervalue love, or patience, or penitence, or humility, any more than we depreciate the eyes or the feet of the babe. Still, the means of the life of the spiritual man is that mouth by which he receives divine food from the truth revealed by the Holy Ghost in sacred Scripture. Other graces produce results from that which faith receives, but for the whole isle of man.

This, dear friends, to proceed a little further, is a very suggestive statement—"The just shall live by his faith;" because it wears so many meanings. First, the righteous man is even to exist by his faith, that is to say, the lowest form of grace in a righteous character is dependent upon faith. But, brother, I hope you will not be so foolish as to say, "If I am but a living child of God, it is all I want;" no, we wish not only to have life, but to have it more abundantly. See yonder man rescued from drowning; he is yet alive, but the only evidence of it is the fact that a mirror is somewhat bedewed by his breath; you would not be content to be alive for years in that poor fashion, would you? You ought to be grateful if you are spiritually alive even in that feeble way; but still we do not want to remain in a swooning state, we wish to be active and vigorous. Yet even for that lowest life you must have faith.

Life also means strength. We say of a certain man, What life he has in him; he is full of life, he seems all alive. Yes, the just obtain energy, force, vivacity, vigor, power, might, life—by faith. Faith bestows on believers a royal majesty. The more they can believe, the more mighty they become. This is the head that wears a crown; this is the hand that wields a sceptre; this is the foot whose royal tread doth shake the nations; faith in God links us with the King, the Lord God Omnipotent.

I would sum up and illustrate this teaching by mentioning certain

INCIDENTS OF LUTHER'S LIFE.

Upon the great Reformer Gospel light broke by slow degrees. It was in the monastery that, in turning over the old Bible that was chained to a pillar, he came upon this passage—"The just shall live by his faith." This heavenly sentence stuck to him; but he hardly understood all its bearings. He could not, however, find peace in his religious profession and monastic habit. Knowing no better, he persevered in penances so many, and mortifications so arduous, that sometimes he was found fainting through exhaustion. He brought himself to death's door.

He must make a journey to Rome, for in Rome there is a fresh church for every day, and you may be sure to win the pardon of sins and all sorts of benedictions in these holy shrines. He dreamed of entering a city of holiness; but he found it to be a haunt of hypocrites and a den of iniquity. To his horror he heard men say that if there was a hell Rome was built on the top of it, for it was the nearest approach to it that could be found in this world; but still he believed in its Pope and he went on with his penances, seeking rest, but finding none. One day he was climbing upon his knees the Sancta Scala which still stands in Rome. I have stood amazed at the bottom of this staircase to see poor creatures go up and down on their knees in the belief that it is the very staircase that our Lord descended when he left Pilate's house, and certain steps are said to be marked with drops of blood; these the poor souls kiss most devoutly.

Well, Luther was crawling up these steps one day when that same text which he had met with before in the monastery, sounded like a clap of thunder in his ears, "The just shall live by his faith." He rose from his prostration, and went down the steps never to grovel upon them again. At that time the Lord wrought him a full deliverance from superstition, and he saw that not by priests, nor priestcraft, nor penances, nor by anything that he could do, was he to live, but that he must live by his faith. Our text of this morning had set the monk at liberty, and set his soul on fire.

No sooner did he believe this than he began to live in the sense of being active.

A GENTLEMAN, NAMED TETZEL, was going about all over Germany selling the forgiveness of sins for so much ready cash. No matter what your offence, as soon as your money touched the bottom of the box your sins were gone. Luther heard of this, grew indignant, and exclaimed, "I will make a hole in his drum," which assuredly he did, and in several other drums. The nailing up of his theses on the church door was a sure way of silencing the indulgence music. Luther proclaimed pardon of sin by faith in Christ without money and without price, and the Pope's indulgences were soon objects of derision. Luther lived by his faith, and therefore he who otherwise might have been quiet, denounced error as furiously as a lion roars upon his prey. The faith that was in him filled him with intense life, and he plunged into war with the enemy.

After a while they summoned him to Augsburg, and to Augsburg he went, though his friends advised him not to go. They summoned him, as a heretic, to answer for himself at the Diet of Worms, and everybody bade him stay away, for he would be sure to be burned; but he felt it necessary that the testimony should be borne, and so in a wagon he went from village to village and town to town, preaching as he went, the poor people coming out to shake hands with the man who was standing up for Christ and the Gospel at the risk of his life. You remember how he stood before that august assembly, and though he knew as far as human power went that his defence would cost him his life, for he would, probably, be committed to the flames like John Huss, yet he played the man for the Lord his God. That day in the German Diet Luther did a work for which ten thousand times ten thousand mothers' children have blessed his name, and blessed yet more the name of the Lord his God.

To put him out of harm's way for a while a prudent friend took him prisoner, and kept him out of the strife in

THE CASTLE OF WARTBURG.

There he had a good time of it, resting, studying, translating, making music, and preparing himself for the future which was to be so eventful. He did all that a man can do who is outside of the fray; but "the just shall live by his faith," and Luther could not be buried alive in ease, he must be getting on with his life-work. He sends word to his friends that he who was coming would soon be with them, and on a sudden he appeared at Wittenberg. The prince meant to have kept him in retirement somewhat longer, but Luther must live; and when the Elector feared that he could not protect him, Luther wrote him, "I come under far higher protection than yours; nay, I hold that I am more likely to protect your Grace than your Grace to protect me. He who has the strongest faith is the best Protector."

Luther could not be still; he must speak, and write, and thunder; and oh, with what confidence he spoke! Doubts about God and Scripture he abhorred. Melancthon says he was not dogmatical; I rather differ from Melancthon there, and reckon Luther to be the chief of dogmatists. He called Melancthon the "soft treader," and I wonder what we should have done if Luther had been Melancthon, and had trodden softly, too. The times needed a firmly assured leader, and faith made Luther all that for years, notwithstanding his many sorrows and infirmities. He was a Titan, a giant, a man of splendid mental calibre and strong physique; but yet his main life and force lay in his faith. He suffered much in exercises of the mind and through diseases of body, and these might well have occasioned a display of weakness; but that weakness did not appear; for when he believed, he was as sure of what he believed as of his own existence, and hence he was strong. If every angel in heaven had passed before him and each one had assured him of the truth of God, he would not have thanked them for their testimony, for he believed God without the witness of either angels or men.

This man was

for he was a man of stormy soul, and only faith could speak peace to him. Those stirring excitements of his brought on him afterward fearful depressions of spirit, and then he needed faith in God. If you read a spiritual life of him you will find that it was hard work sometimes for him to keep his soul alive. Being a man of like passions with us, and full of imperfections, he was at times as desponding and despairing as the weakest among us; and the swelling grief within him threatened to burst his mighty heart.

Luther's faith laid hold upon the cross of our Lord, and would not be stirred from it. He believed in the forgiveness of sins, and could not afford to doubt it. When he came to die his old enemy assailed him fiercely, but when they asked him if he held the same faith his "Yes" was positive enough. They needed not to have asked him, they might have been sure of that. And now to-day the truth proclaimed by Luther continues to be preached, and will be till our Lord Himself shall come. Then the holy city shall need no candle, neither light of the sun, because the Lord Himself shall be the light of His people; but till then we must shine with Gospel light to our utmost. Brethren, let us stand to it that as Luther lived by faith even so will we; and may God the Holy Ghost work in us more of that faith. Amen and Amen.

THE MOHAMMEDAN PROPHECY OF EL MAHDI.

A CORRESPONDENT at Jerusalem says: "Paying a visit to my old friend the Imâm of the principal mosque here, I fell into a conversation with him about the Mahdi, the Mumahid, and Moslem opinions respecting the return of our Lord Jesus and the future religious history of the world. The Imâm, who is a person of learning and influence, very kindly offered to note down for me what he had gathered upon these subjects from Mohammedan writers. The chief source of this information is a book called 'El Isha'ia,' written in the year 1076 (circa 1652 A.D.) by Said Mohammed ben Rasool, who was Mufti at El Medina; the introduction to which work states that the author compiled it from more ancient books, as Dur-el-manthur, Khasais el Kubra, by Sayooty, the writings of Nur-ed-din Ali Es-Samboody, etc.

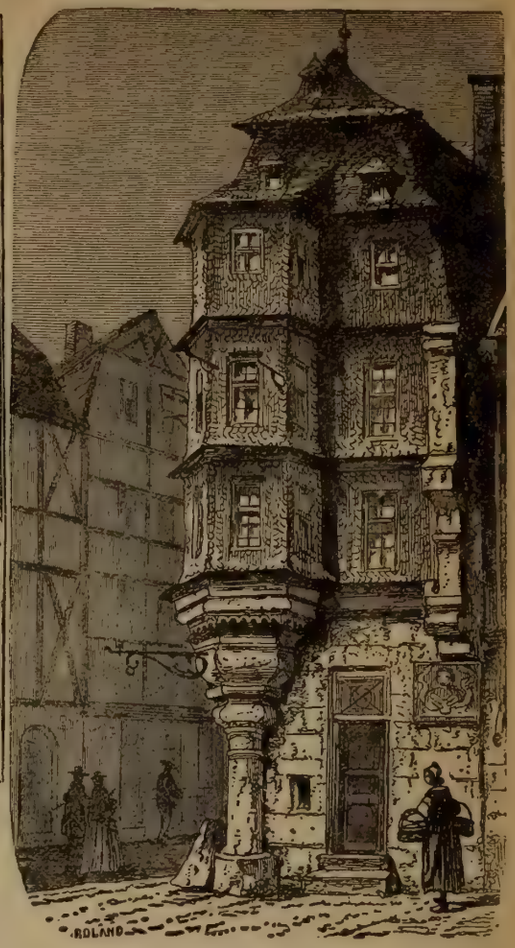
"The learned (Ulema) differ in opinion with reference to the true mahdi. Some say there is no other mahdi but our Lord Jesus; but the truth derived from various traditions of the Prophet appears to be that the mahdi is not Jesus, but another. It is said that he will be born in El Medina, and some say in the west (Africa). He will be Caliph at Jerusalem. He will restore all that Nebuchadnezzar took in the time of the Kings of Israel to Rome in Italy, whose ruler is called the Pope, and will bring back all the precious vessels and jewels of the Temple, and all kings will pay homage to him.

At the time of his appearance the earth will be full of injustice and darkness, but he will fill it with justice and equity. He will treat his subjects with justice. Money will be so abundant that it will be reckoned by measure and not by counting. He will administer justice to the oppressed, and be hospitable; he will do what he says, and say what he knows; he will conquer Rome in Italia which is called Custanteyeh (Constantinople); he will witness the great slaughter in the plain of Acre, or according to some in the valley of Dabikitain near Aleppo; he will destroy the oppressors and establish the faith; he will awaken spiritual life in Islam and raise it after its degradation and death, and will impose taxes on those who are not Moslems; he will conquer China, which is surrounded by a wonderful wall . . . and will send a letter to the King of China admonishing him with Moslem sermons that the King will embrace Islam with all his kingdom, and himself set out with an army of 600,000 men, drawn from those who have been converted to Islam in China. Meeting the horsemen of El Sifiany he will kill many of them, so much blood being shed that it will reach to the horses' heels. The next few years are expected to witness these events."

The New York Herald of November 23d, gives the following account of El Mahdi: "Five years ago the Arab chief now known as El Mahdi, who was a petty prince of one of the tribes below Kordofan, withdrew himself from his followers and became a hermit, thus seeking to involve his very existence in mystery. This proceeding at once increased his fame. From Zaouia to Zaouia of the Senoussia, and consequently from Mecca to Morocco, the attention of the faithful was assiduously called to the following prophecy:

"'On the 1st of the month of Moharrem, in

Martin Luther Called by Frau Cotta.



The House at Eisleben, Germany, in which Martin Luther was Born.

the year 1300 (November 12th, 1882), will appear El Mahdi or Messiah. He will be exactly forty years of age, and of noble bearing. One arm will be longer than the other. His father's name will be Mohammed and his mother's name Fatima, and he will be hidden for a time prior to his manifestations.'

El Mahdi's father was the founder of a sect of semi-religious fraternities which seem destined to cover the whole of North Africa with a web of Moslem Freemasonry. His name was Mohammed, and persons who had seen the younger remember that his right hand reached as far as his knee, thus fulfilling all the requirements of the prophecy. El Mahdi came forth from his retirement and stationed himself on the Island of Abba in the White Nile. He absolved his followers from all allegiance to other powers, and ordered them to discontinue the payment of tribute to the Khédive of Egypt. The refusal of the tribute was an act of rebellion which the Khédive has made several abortive attempts to punish. The latest, this disastrous expedition under General Hicks."

THE LUTHER CELEBRATION.

(See Illustrations on this page.)

The picture on the left of this page represents the scene described in the life of Luther, published in last week's number of The Christian Herald. Luther, the poor student at the University of Erfurt, was frequently obliged to turn out into the streets, where his clear, sweet voice was heard singing carols. All knew the bright-eyed, intelligent youth with the musical voice, but he had no friend so bountiful and so considerate as the good Frau Ursula Cotta, who, one day seeing him in tears, called him into her house and asked the cause of his trouble. Luther told her that his necessities were so urgent that he thought he must abandon study and go back to Mansfeld to work with his father in the mines. Happily, that trouble was averted, and afterward Frau Cotta took care that he should always have a warm welcome in her home.

The picture on the right is of the house in Eisleben in which the great reformer was born. The correspondent of the New York Herald, who attended the celebrations last month, thus describes the house and other objects of interest in the ancient city:

"The building in which he was born is commonly known as Luther's house. It is a small two-story structure, with high gable ends, in the large Gasse, or Lutherstrasse, not far from the Post Office. Above the door is a relief representation of the Reformer. In the popular belief the house was formerly considered incombustible, until a fire broke out in August, 1689, by which the upper story was destroyed, but four years later the damage was entirely repaired by donations from all parts of Germany.

LUTHER'S BIRTH-ROOM,

however, in the first story, was actually proved incombustible, and remains unscathed to this day.

"The Luther relics preserved in the house include his oval writing-table and seal, showing a heart and cross in a rose. A wedding ring, also shown here, is the only copy of the well-known original, with a crucifix and the inscription 'Doctori Martino Luthero, 1525.' The rooms of the building, which are now used as a school for poor children, are decorated with a number of interesting old paintings or epitaphs, the largest of which represent Nebuchadnezzar, by Lucas Kronach. It is some ten feet wide, and the centre figure of three men in a fiery oven, protected by angels, bears Luther's features. Another painting shows ancient Eisleben with the resurrection of Lazarus in the foreground, with portraits of Luther, his wife, Catherine, and his mother. There are also other portraits of the Reformer, with those of the Saxon Electors, his protectors.

"The house in which Luther died stands in the same city close to the market square and St. Andrew's Church, in which he preached so often. It was bought by the Prussian Government in 1862 from its private owners and thrown open to the public after being restored to its original condition. Luther's arm-chair still stands in the corner of the room in which he passed his last days."

ADA WINTHROP'S BROKEN HEART.

Over a newly made grave in a cemetery surrounded by trees a young lady was bending. She was weeping bitterly, watering the earth with the salt rain of unavailing sorrow. By her side, leaning on the stone at the head of the grave, was her cousin, Julia Dobbs, her most intimate friend, who was a year or two younger, but slightly taller than the mourner. Julia possessed a romantic temperament, and while she evidently sympathized deeply with her sorrowing cousin a judicious observer would have seen that she was not the best companion a bereaved girl could have. This connection with a broken heart seemed a luxury to her which she would be sorry to forego. She was "intense" in the sense which that word now conveys in the vocabulary of long-haired youths and lackadaisical young ladies. To have a broken heart and to live a desolated life at eighteen would have been a distinction among other "intense" young ladies, but as she was heart-whole herself the next best thing was to be the chosen friend of one who was heart-broken.

Ada Winthrop had none of her cousin's romance. Her grief was sincere, and she cared not whether people noticed it or not. Ever since she had seen her dear dead lover laid in the silent grave she had mourned with a sense of desolation too deep for a thought of anything else. The picture her mind had drawn of a happy future by the side of the young clergyman, whom she almost idolized, was blotted out. The joys of communion with his stronger spirit, of working for him and with him for the good of others were buried in his grave. If Ada Winthrop had been a Roman Catholic she would have entered a convent and have spent the remainder of her life in seclusion and self-communion. At times the natural elasticity of youth would assert itself, and she would smile through her tears, but she checked herself, as if a smile were a wrong to the memory of the departed. Or if she did not check herself her cousin Julia would draw the harrow of recollection across her heart, and the tears would start afresh. Ada Winthrop was fast sinking into unnatural and foolish melancholy.

"Do you remember that sermon," said Julia, "he preached on the death of that little boy in the village? He spoke of the possibility of the spirits of the dead watching us as we go about the familiar paths. I wonder if he is looking down at us now?"

"Yes," said Ada, "I remember, I do not think I forget anything I heard him say. Oh, why was he taken away from me! I shall never, never be happy again."

"I do not see how you can be, Ada," said her companion. "If I were in your place I think I should weep myself to death. I should wear the deepest mourning, whatever people might say. I think you were wrong to listen to our friends about that. You were as good as married. Many a widow does not feel half so much grief as you do. It would not do to put it on now, of course, but I should have done it at the first."

Robert's Appeal to Ada Winthrop.

"I do not trouble about that, Julia. I only think of him. I do not care whether people know I grieve or not. There, we must go home now." She kissed the sod with a sad farewell caress, and taking Julia's offered arm she turned to take the path homeward which she regularly paced in her daily visit to and from the grave.

The two girls walked slowly beneath the shade of the trees, Julia still continuing to recall to Ada's memory some word or look of the departed that would start again the rain of tears from Ada's eyes. It was a foolish course, but it suited Julia's romantic disposition. She would have despised her friend if any abatement could have come to her grief.

As they approached an opening in the wood they were startled by the sound of footsteps, an unusual sound there at that time of day, the path to the cemetery being little used.

"It is my brother Robert," said Julia a minute or two later. "Where can he be going?"

"I am glad I have met you," the young man said as they came together. "I think you might go down to the Dawson's cottage. There is sad trouble there. I can do no good, but I think you could."

"Ada has trouble enough of her own, Robert," said Julia. "I wonder you have not more consideration for her than to want her to go into more. Her load is heavy enough, poor girl, without taking up that of other people. My poor child," she said, turning to Ada, "no one can understand you."

"You are foolish, Julia," said her brother; "you are making Ada worse. It would be the best thing she could do to go on this errand of mercy. It would lighten her own sorrow to sympathize with other people and to help them. Down there, in that cottage, there is sorrow enough to move any heart."

"What is the matter, Robert?" Ada asked. "If I can do anything I should like to go."

"That is right," said Robert, "I am sure you can. Mrs. Dawson died suddenly this morning, and her husband is away in Europe, and there is no one with the two little children but an unsympathetic hired girl. Come and see if you can dry their eyes."

"It is real mean of you, Robert, to worry Ada," said Julia. "Don't go, dear, you are exhausted with your own grief."

"Julia, I am surprised at you," Robert said. "You are getting quite hard-hearted and selfish. Would you deprive those poor motherless children of a comforter in their sorrow?"

"Say no more," said Ada, "I will go with you, Robert, if you will take me," and releasing Julia's arm she placed her hand on that of Robert and accompanied him to the house of mourning.

"Mamma, mamma, I want my mamma," were the first words Ada heard in childish treble as she entered the home death had desolated. The little curly-headed boy of three years who uttered them was stubbornly refusing to be led away from the door of the death chamber, and the Irish girl was alternately trying threats and coaxing to move him, while another child, only just able to walk, was crying, miserable and neglected in an adjoining room. Ada picked up the young rebel at the head of the stairs and kissed him. "Come with me, won't you?" she said. "I want to tell you why mamma does not come."

"Yes," said the child, "why don't she? I ain't naughty, I promised her I'd be good, and I have been."

Ada carried him down-stairs, and tried with all tenderness to explain to him what death is, and then she took him to the room and showed him the loved form lying placid and motionless. The child dimly understood, and clinging to Ada wept silently until she carried him away. Then she went to the other bereaved little one and ministered to it to the best of her ability. It was a sorrowful task, but when she left the cottage with a promise to return soon, it was with a lighter heart than she had felt since her own crushing sorrow had fallen upon her. She had left sunshine behind her where she had found only gloom.

Day by day for three weeks she paid regular visits to the cottage, and was welcomed by the little ones and by the Irish girl who found her own path brightened by Ada's help and assistance. They looked out for her for hours before she came, and ran to meet her with cries of joy. She thought no less tenderly of her dead lover, but her thoughts were drawn out of herself and occupied themselves in active service. Tiny hands smoothed the wrinkles from her brow and dried her eyes when the tears came. She took the children with her to the grave of her lover, and then crossed with them to the grave that held what was so dear to them. In cheering and comforting them her own heart was comforted.

When Mr. Dawson returned, Ada ceased her visits, but a day or two afterward he called upon her with his children to thank her for her kindness. He was too much depressed to say much, but begged for his children's sake that Ada would continue to come to them. They climbed on her lap and kissed her, and added their entreaties to their father's, and seemed so overjoyed to see her that she knew, as she never expected to know again, the joy of love given and reciprocated. It was not strange; the wise king had said three thousand years before, "He that watereth shall be watered also himself," and Ada was realizing the truth of his words. The affection between Ada and her little friends increased, until after the lapse of two years, much to her cousin Julia's chagrin, she said a timid "yes" in answer to Mr. Dawson's often-urged appeal to her that she would become a mother to the children she had loved and comforted.

POVERTY'S PREY.

A SERIAL STORY.

Money Well Lost.

FOR the next few days, Euclid, a broken-spirited, hopeless old man, dragged his heavy feet over his old rounds, crying, "Cre-she! cre-she!" mournfully, as if by some cruel magic a spell had been cast over him, and he was doomed to tread the dreary streets, with bowed-down head and dragging limbs, uttering no other word but "Cre-she!" His eyes discerned nothing save Victoria being carried before him in a parish coffin. He did not even see Blackett, on the evening of his return from his expedition after work, lying in wait to watch him come home, and jeering after him as he shambled along the passage and up the stairs.

It had been a hard day's work for Euclid, and he was long behind his time. Bess and Victoria had been looking out for him anxiously the last hour or more; and they made much of him, as if they could not do enough to comfort him. But he sat silent and downcast, and only shook his shaggy gray head despondently when Victoria gave him a cup of tea.

"Daddy!" she said, "what's ailin' you?"

"You know, Victoria!" he answered sadly and reproachfully. "God hasn't helped my poor old legs to keep you and me off the parish. Your poor mother when she lay a-dyin', with you on her poor arm, she said as she were sure He'd do as much as that; and He hasn't."

"Have you been to ask help of the parish?" inquired Bess, with eyes round with wonder and alarm.

"No, no, child! not yet!" he replied, a tinge of brownish red creeping over his grim yet pale face. "It's not come to that as yet. But, as I come down the street here in the dusk, there walked alongside, of me a parish funeral—not a real funeral, only the shadow of one, as you may say; and I knowed it were Victoria's. It were Victoria's!" he repeated, his voice breaking down into a sob.

"Father!" cried Victoria, "daddy! how do you know as I shall want a funeral or a coffin?"

"I've been thinking," she went on, "as we've been almost making believe as if I must want a coffin o' my own very soon. Maybe God hasn't let us keep that money, because He doesn't mean me to die just yet. I've been thinkin' hard ever since it was stole; and that's what's come into my head, father. Perhaps God knows I sha'n't want a coffin o' my own yet; and there was some harm, maybe, in our settin' our minds on it."

"Not want a coffin!" repeated Euclid incredulously.

"No," she said, with a faint smile. "I think the thought of it has helped to make me ill. I could go to the p'leece-court after the money was stole, and I'm none the worse for it; and the p'leece has been here to bid us go again to-morrow, and I feel quite sharp and stirred-up like. And I've slept sounder since the money's been gone away from under my head. It was always sayin' quietly in my ear, 'I'm goin' to buy you a coffin! I'm a-goin' to buy a coffin for you!' And then I'd dream of my funeral, and you being left all alone, father. No, God doesn't mean me to want a coffin yet, I think."

Old Euclid sat motionless and speechless, his bowed head lifted up, and his hands firmly grasping his knees, as he gazed fixedly at his daughter. She was very pale, very thin, a small, delicate, weakly creature; but her eyes were brighter, and her face happier, than he had seen them since she was a little, untroubled child, not old enough to understand his difficulties and toil. The tears started to her eyes for a moment as she met his gaze; but she laughed and nodded to him as she wiped them away. If God meant to leave him Victoria, how could he fret about her coffin?

His sleep was disturbed that night; but the waking thoughts that drove it away were happy ones. Had he thought himself an old worn-out man a few hours before? Why, there were years of work in him yet; and he would start afresh after to-morrow. If he could only lay by a little every day he could soon replace his lost treasure. But it should never lie under Victoria's pillow again, to sing that dismal song into her ear. He must find a banker for it; and it should grow without her knowledge. Then his heart softened toward Roger, poor lad! What could he do with such a father? One of his own boys had died about his age; and he thought with peaceful regret of him, blending the two lads together in his half-waking, half-dreamy thoughts.

Bess had to start off for the market alone the next morning, leaving Euclid to go to the police-court to appear against Roger. He and Victoria set out in good time, and had to wait a long while in the large entrance-court of it, while a squalid and rough crowd of men, women, and children gathered together. Victoria, in her long seclusion in her garret, had been kept very much apart from her neighbors; and the brutal faces, and rough, coarse manners of this crowd frightened her. She was glad when an officer summoned her and her father into the court.

They had been there before; yet still the place looked vast and imposing to them, though it was but a small and dimly lighted hall. There were about fifty spectators in it, standing in a small space at the back, looking on and listening in almost unbroken silence. Roger stood at the bar, opposite the magistrate, looking miserable and bewildered. Blackett, dressed decently, like a thoroughly respectable workman, glanced toward him, from time to time, with a glance that made him shiver. Euclid and Victoria gave their evidence again; and the policeman who had arrested Roger told what he had said in admission of the theft. There was no doubt of his guilt; but was his father an accomplice?

There might be a strong suspicion of it in every mind; but there was no proof. Blackett told the magistrate that Roger was a confirmed liar, as well as a confirmed thief. He had often beaten him for his bad conduct, and done his utmost to correct him. He himself had been so hard up for money on the day of the robbery, that he had been compelled to go out and seek work through the country. Not a shilling or a penny could be traced to him; and, if the lad swore he had given it all to him, it was only one out of a thousand lies. He would be glad to have him sent to prison, where he would be taken care of, and taught a trade.

"I've got somethin' more to say," exclaimed Euclid, stepping briskly into the witness-box as soon as Blackett quitted it.

He stood in it as if it had been a kind of pulpit, and he a rugged, unkempt, grim old preacher. His ragged gray hair fell over his wrinkled forehead almost to the shaggy eyebrows, under which his dim and faded eyes gleamed again for a few minutes with his earnestness and resolution. He grasped the wood-work before him with both his hands, and turned his gaze alternately from the magistrate to Roger.

"Don't you send him to jail, your worship!" he exclaimed in a tone of fervent entreaty. "I forgive him free, and Victoria forgives him. It were the money for her coffin he stole; and it's come to her mind as God doesn't mean to let her die yet, and she'll not want a coffin as soon as I thought. I was afeard the parish 'ud have to bury her. The parish!" he cried in a shriller voice, which rang through the court. "I was afeard o' that, or I'd never ha' gone for the police—never! He's only a young, little lad, your worship; and, if you send him to jail, he'll grow up a thief. His two brothers has been in jail, and they're both thieves for good now. I can't call 'em jail-birds; they're jail-chickens, your worship. Oh, your worship! try summat else with Roger. Try what keepin' him out o' jail 'ill do; for it's done no good to his brothers. It makes my heart sore to think as Victoria and me should ha' helped at makin' him a thief. Jail's no good for young lads; no good at all. I'm a old man, and I've seen enough of it. If you'll only let him go free, your worship, I'll forgive him; and Victoria forgives him. Only let us never sit at home o' nights, and think as he's been sent to jail, and made a thief of, by her and me."

Euclid had spoken rapidly and eagerly, utterly disregarding the somewhat feeble efforts of the nearest policeman to silence him. All who were in the court listened, as men always listen to urgent, warm-hearted pleading. Victoria's sad and wan little face, turned toward Roger, pleaded for him as eloquently; and the boy, dropping his face into his hands, broke out into a loud cry as Euclid finished speaking. A gentleman, who was sitting on a seat behind the officials of the court, wrote a few words hurriedly on a slip of paper, and had it passed to the magistrate, who glanced at it, and then turned to Euclid.

"At your request," he said, "I shall not pass sentence on this lad to-day, but remand him for another week. Some inquiries shall be made into Blackett's circumstances and means of helping to pay for the maintenance of his son, and also if any industrial school is open to take him. Blackett, if your two older sons are thieves, it speaks very badly for you; and I shall direct the police to keep an eye upon you and your movements. You may go now."

There was an ominous scowl of hatred on Blackett's face as he crushed past Euclid and Victoria on their way out. Euclid caught sight of it; but he did not speak of it to Victoria, who was overjoyed to think of Roger escaping the doom that had threatened him, and very proud to think that her father had spoken up so well before the justice. It would be something to remember and talk of for many a long day.

But when Bess, coming home in the evening, heard the good news about Roger, she burst out into a passion of sobs and tears. It was not that Roger was saved, but that David was lost. "O mother! mother!" she cried again and again, "if they'd only done the same by him! And mother always said he'd ha' made a good man like father!"

It was two or three days after this, when Euclid and Bess had come in from their cress-selling in the evening, that a loud, strange knock at the door of their garret struck alarm into the hearts of all the three. Blackett had not hitherto molested any of them; but they lived in daily terror of him, and some of their neighbors had warned them to look out for danger. Victoria and Bess uttered a low scream, and Euclid shuffled across the floor to fasten the staple; but already a hand had pushed it a little wider open from the outside, and he could see in the dim light that it was a stranger who was standing there, and a stranger not in the dress of a policeman.

"May I come in?" asked a pleasant voice.

"Air you a friend, or air you a enemy?" inquired Euclid.

"A friend, surely!" answered the stranger. "My name is Dudley, John Dudley; and I bring you news of Roger Blackett. I saw you and Victoria in the court the other day."

"Come in! come in!" exclaimed Euclid, throwing the door wide open; "you're kindly welcome."

The daylight still lingered in the garret, and they could see plainly the pleasant yet grave face of the gentleman who entered, and whose simple and easy manner made them feel confidence in him at once. Victoria set the only chair there was for him, and he took it as if he had been a familiar guest; while Euclid seated himself on the soap-box, and the two girls on the side of the bed. Mr. Dudley looked at them both inquiringly.

"You were frightened when I knocked at the door?" he said.

"Ay, ay!" answered Euclid. "We're all scared a'most to death at Blackett. He's like a ragin' lion; and we canna go in nor out without passin' by his door, sir."

"I'm afraid he'll be worse," said Mr. Dudley; "for he is to pay half a crown a week for the keep of his son Roger."

"Then we shall ha' to flit somewheres," said Euclid mournfully, "and we've lived here nigh upon ten years, me and Victoria. It's hard upon peaceful folks like us, and Victoria can't take away her pretty picters. Look here, sir! we've been ten years a-gettin' 'em together; and, if we are forced to flit, we must leave 'em all behind us."

Above the fireplace, against the wall of the projecting chimney, there was a collection of poor, coarse wood-cuts out of cheap illustrated papers, pasted upon the whitewashed plaster close against one another as they had come into Victoria's possession. Euclid pointed them out with pride mingled with sorrow as he thought of how these treasures must be left behind if they were compelled to quit the garret for other lodgings. He sat down with a heavy sigh after he called Mr. Dudley's attention to Victoria's favorite pictures.

"Are you fond of reading, as well as of pictures?" asked Mr. Dudley.

"None on us can read," answered Euclid. "Victoria was always too weakly to go to school wi' a lot o' rough lads and lasses, she's so nesh and simple. And little Bess there is no scholar; she gets her livin', like me, sellin' creases. Bess is a old neighbor's child, sir, not mine; and Blackett's hated me ever since I took her to live with me and Victoria. He said he'd make the place too hot for me then; but now—"

He shook his gray head dejectedly, and glanced up at his collection of pictures with a fond and regretful gaze.

"I thought the other day in the court, when you pleaded for poor Roger, that you must be a religious man," said Mr. Dudley.

"Oh, dear, no!" answered Euclid in a surprised tone. "I don't rightly know religion; it's above me; for I'm no scholar. I should like it, maybe, if I knew it; and my wife, she was a good woman, she was."

DAVID SPARING HIS ENEMY.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 16, 1 Sam. 24 : 1–17. Golden Text, Matt. 5 : 44. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Saul's Persistent Malignity—David's Reliance on God—Saul Called off—A Formidable Expedition against David—The Temptation in the Cave — David Waiting God's Deliverance — Vengeance Committed to the Lord's Hand—Saul's Humiliating Admission—His Oath Taken and Broken—Not his Own Master—A Second Opportunity—David's Triumph.

SAUL'S enmity to David continued unabated; so mad was his rage that he went so far as to slay all the priests of the Lord, because Abimelech the high priest had sheltered David. He pursued him to Keilah, recently delivered by David out of the hand of the Philistines, and David then fled to the wilderness of Ziph. The time-serving men of Ziph acquainted Saul with his hiding-place; but David was in safer hands than Saul's, and he cried, "Save me, O God, by Thy name, and judge me by Thy strength" (Ps. 54 : 1). Saul's religion at this time was all self; he said to the Ziphites; "Blessed be ye of the Lord; for ye have compassion on me;" David's religion was a simple but unbroken counting upon God, to whom he committed his cause.

David fled to the wilderness of Maon, and now all possibility of escape seemed to be cut off, for "Saul and his men compassed David and his men round about to take him" (1 Sam. 23 : 26). But David's prayer for safety must be answered, leave one real cry of His child unheard, and He had an instrument ready. A messenger came to Saul saying, "Haste thee, and come; for the Philistines have invaded the land." Thus Saul was called away, and David escaped to the strongholds of Engedi. There were always those around King Saul who would make it their business to find out David's hiding-place and to tell the king. Oh, how like those in our own day, who think to betray the cause of men of faith by driving them from pillar to post, by hunting down, with merciless logic, all their testimony to God's present power and grace, for soul and body, who seek by superior numbers to overpower the minority who trust fully in their God!

GOD COULD NOT

Saul took "three thousand chosen men," well drilled and exercised in war, to overcome the man of faith with his six hundred, who might have been looked upon then as the "rag-tag and bobtail" of Israel. How is it Saul needed so large a host for so mean an enemy? He must have felt there were serious odds against him; but did he really take into account that he was fighting against God?

TEMPTATION IN A CAVE.

Saul followed David to "the rocks of the wild goats," and there ventured alone into a cave. Looking in he could see only darkness, but David and his men within it, who saw him enter, were unperceived by him, and there he was completely surrounded by his unseen foes. David's men could see but one thing, that the Lord had delivered David's enemy into his hand, but their leader knew God better than his men did; and his heart was set more upon winning Saul to the right than upon personal revenge. David was king in God's sight, not in his own; his cause was God's cause, he would have no right to ask God to save him by His might, if he were to deliver himself by his own power. So "David arose, and cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privily," and his heart smote him even for doing so much as that, "And he said unto his men, The Lord forbid that I should do this thing unto my master, the Lord's anointed, to stretch forth mine hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of the Lord." Thus David's men were restrained from their thoughts of vengeance, and Saul quitted the cave unmolested.

David followed him and called to him "My lord the king," bending himself to the ground with as much respect as though Saul had been worthy of it, for as long as God suffered Saul to retain the throne of Israel David would treat him as king, for he took his cue from God. And then he said, "Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold David seeketh thy hurt?" And then he made the king aware of the imminent danger which he had just escaped; how his men had bid him kill Saul, and how he had forborne on conscientious grounds, and said, "I will not put forth mine hand against my lord; for he is the Lord's anointed." Then he showed Saul the proof of his having been completely in his power, showing him the skirt of his robe which he had cut off, and called on him by this proof to acknowledge that there was neither evil nor transgression in his hand, and that he had not sinned against the king who, nevertheless, sought after his soul (or life) to destroy it. And he continued, between me and thee, and the Lord avenge me of thee; but mine hand shall not be upon thee." Here was David's strength, he would have nothing to do with Saul, but really passed him over to God. Is this really our case with those who do us evil? How do we act when men malign us, misunderstand us, take advantage of us, misrepresent us? Do we take up our own cause and justify ourselves? Or do we commit the matter to God without touching it, without attempting to right ourselves? If we conduct our own cause, God will leave us to do it; if we trust it over to Him, let us leave Him to it. "The Lord avenge me of thee;" these were terrible words for Saul, and the Lord remembered them. Thus David sought to awaken a sense of shame in Saul, "After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue? After a dead dog, after a flea. The Lord therefore be judge, and judge between me and thee, and see, and plead my cause, and deliver me out of thine hand." Now God was to be Judge and Advocate, how could that cause be lost? how could there be a doubt of the issue?

"THE LORD JUDGE

For the moment David's words produced the strongest impression upon the weak-minded but impressionable king. "Is this thy voice, my son David?" he said, and then with weeping eyes he made the acknowledgment: "Thou art more righteous than I: for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil." Glorious victory! Here was the servant of God justified by the very man who was treating him as a political offender! How much greater the victory than if David had slain him! From that moment David must have risen in the eyes of both Saul's followers and his own; "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city" (Prov. 16 : 32). Saul himself was amazed, and said, "For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? wherefore for that thou hast done unto me this day." And then Saul owned that which he knew about the future, "Now, behold, I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thine hand. Swear now therefore unto me by the Lord, that thou wilt not cut off my seed after me, and that thou wilt not destroy my name out of my father's house."

Oh, how mad it was of Saul to continue this contest, which he knew to be against God! Yet how frequently we see that when God is forcing conviction upon unwilling souls, and they know the hand of the Lord is upon them, and they know that truth is not on their side, the resistance to Him is greater than at any other time! Have we not many of us experienced this, when God was leading us out into a line of His truth which we had opposed, just when light was dawning, the fear to lose that which we had already has driven us to a desperate opposition? Oh, how Saul—oh, how self needs to die, that Christ, our David, alone may reign within us! "David sware unto Saul. And Saul went home." But David was not restored to his position at court. Saul had been obliged to invoke blessing on him, and he had put Saul into God's hands; but no real change took place in Saul's heart; the demon of jealousy might be stilled for the moment, but Saul was his slave, and he had not done with him yet.

A second time the Ziphites came to Saul, to tell him of the hiding-place of David (ch. 26). One would expect that now, after all which had passed, Saul would have indignantly refused to hear them and would have spoken to all men of David's noble forbearance to him. Alas! no. He was under the power of the enemy, and again he went forth with three thousand men to seek David. David could hardly believe it possible, and sent out spies, and at last understood that Saul was come in very deed. Oh, how we see in Saul a man who had every opportunity and yet, because God was departed from him, nothing outward could change him.

ONLY GOD WITH HIM

could make him different. "David arose, and came to the place where Saul had pitched." There lay his enemy sleeping, and all the three thousand men asleep, too; the very sentinels on guard were asleep, "because a deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them" (ch. 26 : 12). Saul was in the most guarded part of the camp, in the very midst, and David inquired of two of his men, Abishai his nephew, and Abimelech the Hittite, "Who will go down with me to Saul to the camp?" Abishai volunteered. They must have passed company after company, perhaps at least a thousand men, before they came to the place where Saul lay, with "his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster;" and a cruse of water at his head. Abishai, with all the energy of a young man, said, "God hath delivered thine enemy into thine hand this day; now, therefore, let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him the second time." But David looked at things from God's point of view; he knew a closer guiding of God than that of circumstances, for circumstances would all have pointed strongly to his now taking advantage of Saul; and he said, "As the Lord liveth, the Lord shall smite him; or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle, and perish."

David could afford to let opportunities slip, because he was counting upon God; thus he again declared that he would not stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed. But he took the cruse of water and the spear and went away to a hill far enough to be clearly out of the camp, and then cried aloud to Abner in irony that he kept his lord so ill that he had been in danger of his life, and called him to mark where was the king's spear and where the cruse that was at his bolster? Saul awoke, and knowing the voice, hearing what had happened, upon David's appeal to him, said, "I have sinned: return, my son David: for I will no more do thee harm, because my soul was precious in thine eyes this day: behold, I have played the fool, and erred exceedingly." Again David's triumph was complete. Let us really and always commit our cause to the Lord, act in His Spirit by His guidance, and we shall find that to "resist not evil" (Matt. 5 : 39) is the divine way and the way of blessing and victory.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Verdict of Guilty has been Rendered against O'Donnell, the Irish-American who shot Carey on board the South African steamer. The trial was held last week, and the jury considered for two hours on Saturday before giving their verdict. The prisoner, who had maintained his levity and indifference throughout the trial, burst into a torrent of oaths and curses when sentence of death was pronounced. He had expressed his confidence from the time the crime was committed in his acquittal, and the verdict and sentence appeared to strike him with amazement. The shooting was admitted by the prisoner, but it was claimed to have been done in self-defence, and an effort was made to prove that Carey had a pistol in his hand when he was shot. General Roger A. Pryor, who was sent over by the Irishmen in America to defend O'Donnell, did not address the court. The prisoner and his counsel thought that the fact of his appearing for O'Donnell and his being paid to do so by Irishmen in America would prejudice the jury and lead them to conclude that O'Donnell in "removing" Carey acted as an authorized agent of the Invincibles.

The Friendly Relations of Germany and Spain have been cemented by the visit of the heir of the German Crown to Madrid. The reception accorded to him by the King of Spain, the Government, Spanish society, and by learned bodies has been of the most hearty and cordial character. Courtesies have also been interchanged directly between the two courts, and the Emperor of Germany has sent an autograph letter of thanks to King Alfonso thanking him for the kindness shown to his son. The King is reported to have said in the course of an interview with a distinguished personage connected with the diplomatic corps, "I hope the French will now let us alone. The people in France must be endowed with very little political sagacity to believe that I was going to make a hard-and-fast alliance with Germany. Like all good Spaniards, I am fully aware that the best thing for Spain is to live on good terms with all our neighbors, and especially our next-door neighbors. But it is very hard to find one's self every day insulted with impunity by the press of a neighboring country that, with the same breath, insists upon our devoted friendship." It is evident that the Spanish incident has resulted in the more complete isolation of France in Europe.

Another French Outrage in Madagascar is reported. Advices from Zanzibar say that the British man-of-war Dryad, which has arrived there, reports that a French man-of-war bombarded the unfortified town of Vohemar, on the north coast of Madagascar, on November 8th, without giving any previous notice. Five British subjects were killed and much property belonging to neutrals was destroyed or plundered. The effect of this intelligence is to widen the breach already existing in the cordial relations of England and France.

Advices from Khartoum Tend to Confirm the report that General Hicks and his Egyptian army have been annihilated by El Mahdi. A despatch to the London Times from Khartoum says that a Copt merchant who witnessed the battle between the Egyptian army and the forces of El Mahdi saw Ala-ed-Deen Pasha, Governor of Khartoum, killed at the opening of the battle. He says that Hicks Pasha was slain by a lance on the third day of the battle, when the last cartridge of the Egyptians had been fired. The men in Hicks Pasha's army had then been without water for three days, and the soldiers were offering $4 for a drink. The fugitives, if any, from the Egyptians, must have been slain or captured while making for well-known wells. It is doubtful what El Mahdi's designs are, but it is expected that his first step will be to attack Khartoum, which cannot be held by its garrison. The Egyptian troops will in all probability fly from the city when El Mahdi approaches, and Colonel Valentine Baker, with a small force of about 2000, has been ordered forward to interpose between the retreating garrison and El Mahdi. If the conquering fanatical leader decides on attacking Tripoli he will be fought by the French, but if he moves on Egypt or goes to Mecca to have himself proclaimed Mohammed's successor he will come into conflict with the English forces.

No News from Tonquin of Importance was published last week. An impression prevailed in Paris that the government had received intelligence of some disaster to the French arms, but if it had it did not disclose it. A request for information made to the French Premier was evaded, though he admitted that the situation was grave. A cable despatch from Paris on November 26th indicates that England has intimated to France that there are limits to her proceedings which she cannot pass without danger of European complications. It says: "The British Foreign Office, acting upon the conviction that the contemplated blockade by France of the Chinese ports would never be respected by English shipowners, has caused the strongest possible representations to be made to the French Government to the effect that such a blockade will be almost certain to disturb the peaceful relations of England and France. The French Government has been categorically informed that should any British ship be captured while running a blockade by a French war vessel, a popular agitation would break out in England that would inevitably compel the active interference of the British Government in such a manner as could not be otherwise than disagreeable to France."

An Agreement Respecting the Suez Canal project has been arrived at by M. De Lesseps and the English shipowners. The difficulty existing was caused by the reluctance of M. De Lesseps to accord the Englishmen the share in the control they considered was due them as citizens of the country that uses the canal most. The convention concluded on November 29th provides that either the present canal shall be enlarged or a second canal shall be constructed. A commission of engineers and shippers, half of whom are to be English, will decide the question. Seven new directors, chosen from English shippers and merchants, are to be admitted as members of the board. A consultative committee of English directors is to be formed in London. The company is in future to bear all the expenses resulting from accidents on the canal, excepting collisions, or resulting from damage to the company's property, provided ships are not in fault. From January 1st, 1884, pilotage dues are to be abolished, and from January 1st, 1885, transit dues are to be diminished according to the rate of dividend.

The Russian Officials who Aided the Jeannette party of shipwrecked explorers have all been rewarded by the Czar. General Tchernaieff, the commander of Yakutsk in Siberia, where the distressed Americans were so kindly received, has written a letter to Engineer Melville informing him of the Czar's condescension. The general gets the following personal letter of thanks from the Czar: "The Emperor announces his imperial thanks to the Governor of Yakutsk, General Tchernaieff, for all official acts, and for his humane attentions to the American officers and men, the survivors of the Arctic steamers Jeannette and Rodgers." The other officials received silver medals of merit. The peasants who fed them and helped them on their way to Yakutsk get medals and presents of money, and the exiles who acted as interpreters and messengers have had their papers sent to St. Petersburg with recommendations to mercy, and will probably obtain some commutation of their sentences.

The White Cross Army is a New Organization established in Great Britain, having for its object the promotion of social purity. It is making great progress in the North of England. The London Christian thus speaks of the army and the circumstances that have called it into existence: "The Blue Ribbon movement has a noble mission, and we rejoice in its widespread success; but its work is not higher or more important than that which aims to put a social ban on impurity, and to stem the torrent of abuses which flow from its prevalence. There is ample room and deep need for united and organized effort to uphold purity of life and conversation among old and young. Offences against morality are grievously winked at and tolerated on every hand by many who might and ought to be quick and strong to put them down." The White Cross Army endeavors to remedy the injustice which fixes the stigma of the sin on the woman alone and lets the man go free.

The Moody and Sankey Meetings in London continue to be thronged by vast multitudes, and the English newspapers report that a large proportion are now church-goers. The London Record, a Protestant Episcopal journal, after describing the meetings, pays the following tribute to the American evangelists: "We must express our profound conviction that few men are more entitled to the gratitude of the Church of England in particular than the two evangelists who have now been once more welcomed to London. Mr. Moody said on Sunday morning that he had personally met with the fruits of the London work of 1875 in almost every place he had since visited, both in Europe and America; but we need not go beyond the metropolitan area itself to find reasons to thank God for that work."

Rev. Griffith John, Missionary of the London Missionary Society at Hankow, China, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 25th, 1882, has translated the Gospel of Mark into easy Wên-li, and the Gospel of John is in the printer's hands. It is expected that this version will be very popular.

The Growth of Socialism in England.—Referring to the recent International Trades Union Conference in Paris, an English journal states that "the delegates have shown that the official representatives of workmen still retain a wholesome dislike of fussy attempts on the part of the State to control the operation of economic forces. Behind the leaders of trades unions, however, there is evidently a growing party which has ardent faith in the power of governments to make an end of poverty. Multitudes of working men seem to be eager to take part in some great movement against both capitalists and landlords. It is constantly said that there is no danger of all this ferment leading to socialistic agitation. But the fact that twenty-five years ago socialists were a small and obscure party in Germany, whereas now there is not a village in the empire in which they are not to be found, is ominous. What reason is there for believing that the development of socialism may not be even more rapid among ourselves? The gulf between rich and poor is as great here as anywhere."

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3, including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

THE fame of Mildmay Conference Hall is world-wide. Most American Christians are familiar with its name. Many have visited it in their transatlantic excursions and have learned something of the work carried on there. They have come away stimulated to more active labor in the cause of Christ and impressed with a conviction that careful thought and systematic effort render Christian labor, faith, and love to souls more efficacious than they could be if unorganized. As it is in business so it is in religion, order and system lead to success. The church on earth is an aggressive institution; it is engaged in a warfare against mighty foes, and its campaigns ought to be carefully thought out and directed. Otherwise there is danger that workers may crowd on one point and hinder each other, while other strongholds of the enemy are left unassailed. This is the kind of work of which Mildmay has become the centre. From it radiate missions of all kinds. It has a night school for instructing adults, an Invalid Kitchen, a Dorcas Society, a Medical Mission, a Regular Service for Deaf Mutes, a Home for Inquirers, a Printing-Office, an Office for the Deaconess Work, a Nursing House, Two Hospitals, Bible Flower Mission, Cab Mission, Railway Mission, Convalescent Home, Training College, and several other branches of usefulness. It is impossible to form an estimate of the amount of good done through all these agencies. Eternity alone will reveal it.

Naturally the work has grown and developed from a small beginning, but the conception of it, the vital force that has spread into so large and potent a force were there at the first. The portrait on the first page this week is that of the founder of Mildmay, a man whose piety and Christian energy are bearing fruit now though he has passed away from the scene of his earthly labors.

Mr. Pennefather was born in Dublin, Ireland, on January 5th, 1816, and fell asleep in Jesus on April 30th, 1873, at the age of fifty-seven. His father was for thirty-six years one of the most honorable of Irish judges; and his mother came of an estimable family. William's early childhood was remarkable chiefly for an amount of energy and vivacity of mind which contrasted somewhat strangely with a very languid and delicate constitution. He was not sent to school until he was thirteen years of age, at which period he became a pupil in an admirable academy at Westbury, near Bristol, where his name was long remembered, and many who knew him there have since spoken of him as "the saintly boy."

EARLY RELIGIOUS IMPRESSIONS.

It is difficult to discover when his heart was first given to God, but it is evident that it was in his early years, and the loving entreaties of a godly sister were evidently used to foster the growth of spirituality in the boy's soul, and he went to school as one who had already and unalterably taken the Lord for his God.

Even in these early days he had begun to exercise that strong personal influence for which he was afterward so remarkable, and in spite of petty persecution which it involved, a little band of boys regularly assembled for Bible-reading and prayer under his leadership. (See frontispiece.) The lads used to meet in one of the dormitories, where they would read and discuss some passage of Scripture. This class was much blessed to many, and left its traces long after young Pennefather had departed from the school.

In 1832 the youth was placed under the care of the Rev. W. Stevens, at Levens Parsonage, near Kendal, after which, in the summer of 1834, Mr. Pennefather returned to his father's house in Dublin, and entered at Trinity College as a student. He was then only eighteen years of age. But it soon became apparent that the state of his health was such as to make further study impossible, and to set aside all present prospect of continuing his college course. At one time there was considerable apprehension of consumption, but after a protracted season of weakness and suffering it was discovered that there was no organic disease.

From earliest childhood it had been the longing of his heart to enter the ministry of the Episcopal Church, and God was preparing in His own way, though it might seem a dark way, to fulfil this cherished desire.

EVANGELISTIC WORK IN CONNEMARA.

In January, 1837, Mr. Pennefather was permitted to resume his studies at Trinity College, residing, however, at his father's house, and attending the classes, lectures, etc., daily. In the summer of 1839 we find him interesting himself in a little flock of Protestants at a place called Roundstone, on the wild western coast of Connemara, who were reported to him as being in great ignorance, without either church or pastor, and who would give a delighted reception to any minister who would visit and preach to them.

The long vacation had begun; he had some time at his disposal, and he commenced at once. On the first Sunday of vacation Mr. Pennefather held his first services in the place, and on the Monday visited an afflicted young woman who had been confined to her bed for four years.

AN INTERESTING CONVERT.

This young invalid had been brought up a Roman Catholic, and was hired by an English lady, who took her to church, where she was converted from the errors of Romanism. Her conversion exasperated her Roman Catholic acquaintances, and soon after her public profession of faith she was waylaid and beaten so violently that she was not able, at the time of the young student's visit, to leave her bed, yet he found her blessing God for her heavy chastisement, praying for her enemies, and confessing that her happiest hours had been spent on that sick-bed.

The same afternoon Mr. Pennefather went to a friend's house at Ballinahinch, to meet the mail-car in the morning, which passed near the spot. This gentleman lived in imitation of the ancient princes of Connemara, his house without an avenue, in the midst of heath and rocks. The following morning he left the house referred to in a gig for the purpose of meeting the mail, and as they were passing over a river on a bridge, the parapet of which was broken down, he said to the servant,

"THIS IS A DANGEROUS SPOT."

At that moment the horse reared, the shafts were broken, the gig upset, and both riders were nearly precipitated into the river beneath, but, providentially, they escaped, without sustaining any damage. (See frontispiece.)

In 1840 Mr. Pennefather took his B.A. degree at Dublin University, and the following year he was ordained and appointed to

AN IRISH CURACY.

Space will not allow us to follow Mr. Pennefather through the laborious details of a parochial minister's life. Here and there we find bright gleams of promise; but the sphere was a difficult one, and diligence, rather than any marked success, seems to characterize the records of his ministry at this early period.

In July, 1844, he was presented with the living of Mellifont, near Drogheda. The parish was very extensive, with a population of 4500; but the Protestants were few, and scattered over a wide area, which made the pastoral work fatiguing and unsatisfactory. Outwardly it presented some attractions, but regarding it from a ministerial point of view, Mr. Pennefather always looked back on his residence at Mellifont as a time of trial and discouragement, a time in which God was preparing him in much loneliness for a future of active and varied service.

MARRIAGE.

The next few months were full of employment, and comprised, in addition to the regular services, mission-room services and cottage-lectures, and much evangelistic effort on behalf of the Irish Society; but failing health compelled moderated activity, an enforced absence from home, and visits to Germany and England. In the early part of the summer of 1847 we find him spending some time in the beautiful English county of Kent, where he met the beloved Christian lady who afterward became his wife.

On September 16th, in the same year, he married Miss Catherine King, eldest daughter of Admiral King, and after a pleasant honeymoon amid the natural beauties of Westmoreland, the devoted minister and his bride returned to Mellifont, where, in the month of November, they rendered exemplary service to a starving and fever-stricken population. The straitness of his means at this time may be learned from a letter which, in January, 1848, Mr. Pennefather wrote to his brother Richard, in which he says: "My income from this parish is under £84 ($420). My door is besieged by half-starving creatures, just out of fever, craving for food."

REMOVAL TO ENGLAND.

In the early part of this year (1848) he was offered and accepted the incumbency of a church in England. Though the thought of leaving Ireland was painful and perplexing in the extreme, he nevertheless viewed the appointment as from God, and trusted Him for all that was to follow. Upon arriving at the scene of his labor, he was conducted to a small lodging, and soon discovered that his church was destitute of all architectural beauty, in a town, far from picturesque, situated in a wide plain and with an uninteresting population. Very soon, however, the canal basin, with its dingy coal-wharf and the rows of dirty, squalid-looking cottages, with their duck-ponds and ditches, were among his most favorite resorts, for here he had abundant opportunity of proclaiming the salvation of the Saviour whom he so dearly loved.

WORK AMONG BARGEMEN.

This period of Mr. Pennefather's life was characterized by much activity and blessing. His work among the bargemen was highly appreciated, and its results decidedly encouraging. He had obtained an old boat, which was converted into a sort of floating chapel, fitted up with a desk and benches, and capable of holding about one hundred persons. Here a simple service was held on Sunday evening, and also during the week. It was a touching sight to see the men who had just turned in from their rough work among the rubbish-heaps and coal-dust so melted under the power of God's truth that sobs and tears unrepressed testified to their emotions. A number of these men became regular attendants at the church. The change in the lives of many of the people was striking, so manifest, indeed, that a jesting article in one of the local papers closed with the remark, "In Walton, at any rate, the Millennium must have begun." (A picture on the frontispiece illustrates one of these services.)

INTEREST IN PROPHECY.

The subject of unfulfilled prophecy, especially in connection with the second coming of Christ, had been one of deep interest to Mr. Pennefather almost from his childhood. When scarcely more than a boy, he had the privilege of intercourse with many deeply-taught students of Scripture, some of whom were in the habit of meeting at the invitation of Lady Powerscourt, for the study of prophetic truth. In after years "the blessed hope" became an integral part of his spiritual life, and permeated his whole ministry. He was for many years a member of the Prophetical Society, which met in April and November of each year, and always rejoiced to talk with those who were daily looking for the coming King, and it was his delight to meet a little band, among his own flock at Aylesbury, have now stood firm so long, when previously you always fell?' Slowly and with tears in his eyes, he answered, 'Only that formerly I always used to keep myself, but now I let Jesus keep me, and I have faith to believe that He is strong enough to help and keep me.' That is the great secret. If only Jesus keep us, then all will be well with us."

What an Irish Papist Found.—At a Noon-day prayer-meeting, Mr. Jack said: "During the Irish revival of 1869, a poor ignorant Papist woman, going along a road, found a Presbyterian token of admission to the Communion Table. On one side of the token were the words, 'This do in remembrance of Me.' 'Who is the Me?' was her mental query. She inquired at the house of a Protestant family about it, and had the Gospel explained to her. It made her long for a more intimate acquaintance with the Lord Jesus. Her neighbors reported her case to the minister, who called upon the poor woman, and had the inestimable joy of leading her to Christ. When he rose to leave, he asked for the token, but she replied, 'Ah, no, I'll not give you the token till I give it to you at the Lord's Table.'"

Lifted from the Lowest Depth.—Mr. Douglas said: "Long years ago Professor Finney was preaching in a meeting like this. He was a man greatly blessed by God to the awakening and salvation of sinners. At the end of his address a man who was a most accomplished villain, hardly any infamy was too low for him, provided he could effect it without getting into contact with the law, rose and said, 'I am convinced that what these men say is true; the question then is, "Shall I leave this building saved or unsaved?"' A breathless silence pervaded the whole assembly, and after a slight pause he continued, 'Must I go unsaved? No; I must, I will trust in Christ.' What a glorious burst of praise rose from that meeting when he sat down! This man became as anxious after the salvation of souls as before he had been greedy after sin."

Covering a Hole in a Window.—Major Colquhoun said, at the Broomielaw: "A missionary while going his rounds one day, entered a miserable-looking room in which a workingman was lying ill on a pallet of straw upon the floor. The missionary read to him from his Bible, 'This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.' 'Ah, yes! that's mine!' said the sick man. 'How so? What d'ye mean?' 'I got the British Workman and thought I read it all, but somehow I missed that text. My wife takes a glass too much, and tore up the paper to cover the hole in the window. I have good eyes, and as I lay helpless I read and re-read that text till it brought peace and salvation to my soul.' The invalid's face was lighted up, and his eyes sparkled with joy, as he told the story. The missionary went on his way rejoicing, cheered and comforted by the incident, which showed the power of the Lord."

Forbidding an Execution.—Major Colquhoun said: "At Havana, in the Island of Cuba, the inhabitants rebelled against the might and power of Spain. So strong were the rebels that the authorities had great trouble in putting them down. A seaman was seized by some Spanish soldiers, and charged with being a recruiting-agent for the rebels. The charge was not true, he being there on his legitimate business. He was of British parentage, but an American by residence, so he appealed to the British and the American consuls for help and protection. They protested against the action of the Spaniards, declaring the man's innocence, but without effect, for the sailor was condemned to be shot. In the cool of the morning a firing party marched outside the town with the British-American sailor in their midst, and soon they were ranged with loaded rifles ready to send death into the victim of injustice. Mr. Hayward, the British consul, said, 'I appeal and protest against this illegal execution.' The Spanish hidalgos, with an expression of contempt, replied, 'Too late, señors; too late; the man must die.' Then the order was given, 'Ready, present.' At that critical moment Mr. Hayward threw the British flag around the almost fainting man, shouting, 'In the name of the Queen, hold!' Following his example, the American consul flung the Stars and Stripes over him also, saying, 'In the name of the United States I forbid you to fire.' Sullenly the order was given to ground arms, and return to the barracks. The man was saved, not by the consuls, nor by his own power, but because he was covered by the flag of his country, which represented its power. So the sinner who places himself under Christ will be covered by Him, and saved from misery and endless torment."

THE APPROACHING TRANSLATION OF THE LIVING SAINTS.

By Rev. J. R. Graves, LL.D.

THE DAY OF REWARDS.

It is when Christ comes for His saints that they will appear before Him to be justified by their works and receive the judgment of awards for all they have labored and endured, sacrificed and suffered for Him in this world. "We [Paul is addressing Christians] must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things he hath done, whether good or bad" (II Cor. 5 : 10; Rom. 14 : 12). Then will the parable of the talents be fulfilled and the servant who made ten talents, by the faithful use of the talents intrusted, be made ruler over ten cities, and the one who made five, over five cities, while the evil, who was only a professed servant, will be left with those whose resurrection will be to shame and everlasting contempt. That there will be different awards, positions of honor and glory, according as our works are found to be by the impartial Judge, is recognized by the inspired writers under both dispensations.

Salvation is solely by grace, and is not in the least conditioned upon our works; but God graciously rewards His children for each good work they have done from the right motive, love to Him, even the giving to His disciples a cup of cold water; but there will be some, and very many ministers, who will receive no reward in that world, no position of honor, but barely salvation.

Paul, in his first letter to the church at Corinth (ch. 3), seems to address a warning to ministers and master-church-builders under Christ, the Great Architect, and he warns his fellow-laborers to take heed with what material they build upon the foundation Christ has laid. "And if on this foundation any one build up gold, silver, costly stones, wood, hay, straw, the work of each will become manifest, for the day will show it, because it is revealed by fire, and so every one's work, whatever it is, the same fire will prove. If the work of any one remain which he built up, he will receive a recompense; if the work of any one shall be consumed, he will suffer loss; he himself, however, will be saved, but as through a fire." Escape with nothing but his bare life.

This will be the day that the prizes will be awarded to Christians—not salvation, which is a free gift and not contingent upon works, but something more than salvation, and which does depend upon the Christian's works and his faithfulness in this life.

THE CORONATION DAY.

Those who are rewarded with the highest vocation, i.e., to reign with Christ, will receive their crowns at Christ's coming, but not before. There can be no doubt of this. Peter says: "And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away" (I Pet. 5 : 4). Paul says: "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing" (II Tim. 4 : 8).

It is clearly implied that there will be some Christians who will stand ashamed in the presence of Christ at His coming: "And now, little children, abide in Him; that when He shall appear we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming" (1 John 2 : 28).

And it is also implied that there will be many eminent members and ministers who will not receive a crown of righteousness, i.e., of personal right doing—not of Christ's righteousness—for this is given only to those saints who have well done and been faithful—those to whom Christ can say, "Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful." What multitudes to whom Christ will be unable to say this!

This coming was what the faith of the primitive Christians took hold of, and constituted their "blessed hope"—for this they suffered, for this they looked, waited and prayed. "Looking for that blessed hope, even the glorious appearing of the great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus 2 : 13). "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh" (James 5 : 7, 8). "And to wait for His Son from heaven, whom He raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come" (1 Thess. 1 : 10). "And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ." (II Thess : 3 : 5)

Will not my reader now turn back to Matt. (24 : 42 and on) and mark what our Lord says of the unwatchful goodman, of the faithful and wise servant, and of the evil servant who will not believe in his Lord's immediate coming: "Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. But know this, that if the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. Who then is a faithful and unwise servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when He cometh shall find so doing. Verily I say unto you, That He shall make him ruler over all His goods. But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My Lord delayeth His coming; and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; the Lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for Him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites." (Matt. 24 : 42–51).

Then follows the parable of the ten virgins which as yet has not had, and which will never have, a fulfilment until at the coming of Christ, for His saints, to own, manifest and reward them; and I introduce it here as another and conclusive proof that His coming will be premillenial.

That parable at least teaches this great truth, that only those who are prepared and are truly waiting for the appearing of the Bridegroom will be received and blessed by Him. While the only apparently but not really prepared will be rejected by Him; and also this other fact, that it will be too late to prepare when the summons is heard.

Will we not, as good servants, heed our Master's earnest, loving warning to watch and be ready for His coming? whether it be to-night or to-morrow—it is not far off—it is nearer than we imagine. Let us heed the words, the last words, of the Bridegroom: 'Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame" (Rev. 16 : 15). "Behold, I come quickly, and My reward is with Me." The prayer of the waiting Bride of Christ is, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Message, Sent to Congress on Tuesday, December 4th, has been well received by the press of both the great political parties. Its suggestions are moderate, conservative and sagacious, and they are expressed clearly and forcibly. They, of course, are not approved by every one, but those who disapprove deem them worthy of respectful consideration. In dealing with foreign affairs, the President announces that our relations with other nations are "upon a friendly footing." He mentions several countries with which commercial treaties have been made, notably Corea and Madagascar. He calls attention to the action of the British Government in sending to this country large numbers of paupers who will become a burden on the community, and advises a revision of legislation with the view of preventing them entering the States either directly or through Canada. He also suggests that the time has arrived when the wrongs inflicted on American shipowners at Cuba, Puerto Rico, and other ports, which the Spanish Government is slow to redress, may be appropriately met by measures of retaliation. On financial questions the President's recommendations are disappointing. He does not advise any legislation tending to diminish the national revenues, preferring to wait until the results of the bill passed last session can be fully realized. He is, however, opposed to the rapid extinction of the debt. The difficulty then arises of the disposal of the enormous surplus which must accumulate. That will not long remain a difficulty if the President's recommendations respecting our harbor defences and the protection of our commerce at sea are acted upon. In all countries those two ways of getting rid of money are very efficient. It may be hoped, however, that Congress will recognize the claims of the overburdened taxpayers to some measure of relief, the passage of which the surplus justifies. The President recommends a radical and extreme mode of dealing with the Mormon question. He advocates the abolition of the Territorial Government and the assumption of absolute political control of the Territory by Congress, its acts to be carried into effect through a national commission. The reduction of postage on local letters to one cent, and a government supervision of inter-State communications by telegraph are the most prominent of the minor suggestions made in the message. The general tone of the message indicates that President Arthur desires a quiet and uneventful session of Congress, and that he has not overlooked the fact that there will be a Presidential election in 1884.

Secretary Folger's Report Attracts Little less notice than the President's message. According to the Secretary's estimate the financial year ending June 30th next will close with a surplus of eighty-five millions, which will be forty millions more than is required for the sinking fund. He believes that if there is no change made the revenue will continue to increase and will produce a net surplus of sixty millions in the following year. To avoid this the Secretary is of opinion that "there ought to be a reduction of taxation." He is, however, like the President, opposed to reduction this year. Ultimately the taxes on imports are those which he thinks it will be best to reduce, especially imports of raw materials and sugar and molasses. In making changes in the internal revenue the Secretary urges reduction rather than repeal. As to the national bank circulation he advises that the banks be permitted to issue notes to the value of ninety per cent of the average market value their bonds attained during the year preceding the issue of the notes. At present the circulation is largely over-secured. A suspension of the silver coinage act is recommended, only one-seventh of the dollars coined last year having gone into circulation. The Secretary recommends the redemption of the trade dollars in standard dollars, dollar for dollar, but the President disagrees with him, and advises that they should be bought up at a trifle over their bullion value. These financial problems are just now the most prominent of all political questions, and it would be well if every citizen who desires to give an intelligent vote next year would study them and watch the policy of the two parties in dealing with them.

Another Effort to Suppress Polygamy in Utah is made in a bill introduced by Senator Edmunds, which he characterizes as a supplementary measure to that which he framed and which was passed by the last Congress. The new bill requires, under severe penalties, that every marriage shall be recorded in a proper court, and that husbands and wives shall be compelled to testify in any case where bigamy or polygamy is charged. It also abolishes all elective offices in the Territory, and vests their functions in a commission, and deprives women of their power to vote at elections. So sweeping a measure is certain to excite a determined opposition.

A Call Signed by General Grant and Thirty-nine other prominent men was issued last week, for assistance in founding an International Bimetallic Monetary Association. We are requested to assist in giving publicity to this movement, and we do so gladly, believing that it is high time this question was definitely settled. At present the United States are bearing an almost intolerable burden in attempting almost single-handed to maintain the silver standard. If the gentlemen who signed the call will now make the attempt to induce other nations to adopt the two standards, they will learn whether our self-sacrifice has any prospect of success. If other nations will not follow our example, and are determined not to adopt the double standard, then it will be obvious that no useful purpose can be served by our persisting in our present policy.

A Deplorable Calamity Occurred on Sunday, December 2d, about midnight on the Atlantic. A pilot boat and her yawl were run down by the Guion steamer Alaska, and all on board perished. It appears that the Alaska, which left Liverpool for New York on November 24th, when about seventy-five miles from port signalled for a pilot, and was answered by a boat which now proves to have been No. 8. There were four pilots in the boat and a crew of six men who managed the yawl. One of the pilots entered the yawl to go aboard the ship, but when he was alongside, and before he had caught hold of the rope ladder thrown out to him from the Alaska, the big steamer's head drifted around and crashed into the pilot boat which was waiting to pick up the yawl, and sank her instantly. Those on board the yawl saw what happened, and their agitation was so great that they forgot their own dangerous position, and, being lifted by a swell, the yawl capsized and they, too, were drowned. Passengers on the Alaska say they heard heart-rending cries from the drowning men. One cried, "For God's sake save me! I am a father." A still more dreadful utterance was heard, "Oh, save me, I am not fit to die!" The Alaska lowered a boat and threw over an illuminated buoy, but not one of the men on board the pilot boat and the yawl was saved. They probably drifted astern and were crushed by the propeller. The Alaska remained near the place all night, and at daybreak, there being no sign of the wreck, continued her voyage to New York.

An Interesting Anniversary was Celebrated in New York on December 2d. It was the eleventh anniversary of the Church mission to deaf-mutes. Rev. Thomas Gallaudet, D.D., explained the system of idea language established and developed by his father and himself, and showed by his address to the one hundred and fifty deaf-mutes present, how perfectly he could make himself understood by them. To the audience he said: "My mother was a mute and I learned the language of signs as soon as I did the English language. My wife is a mute and I have spent my life among mutes. Signs and motions have been gradually built up into a system which is now entitled to be called a language—the language of motion—a pantomime of ideas. Some mutes are taught to speak, but in rare instances. I speak to the mutes in this idea language, which means that I do not spell out the words it would take to express ideas; in fact, I never think of words or language at all, but am able frequently by a motion to express completely my meaning. Only proper names have to be spelled with the fingers. There is no English or French or Spanish or German in this idea language; it is universal, and mutes of different nationalities can converse as readily as those of the same." Dr. Gallaudet's father established in 1817, at Hartford, Conn., the first school for deaf-mutes in the United States.

The Condition of the Freedmen is the Subject of a paper contributed to Harper's Weekly by Frederick Douglass, who has abundant opportunities of making himself acquainted with the progress they are making. He claims that mentally, morally, and materially there are signs of considerable advancement. There are, he states, from two to three hundred thousand colored children attending school, and both the children and their colored teachers have demonstrated their capacity for learning in a remarkable degree. Of the moral progress Mr. Douglass is constrained "to speak in a lower tone," but there, too, he believes "there is a visible and growing improvement in honesty and chastity." For proof of the material progress made, Mr. Douglass quotes official figures, showing that in the State of Louisiana alone, the colored people pay taxes on twenty million dollars' worth of property; that five years ago in Georgia they paid taxes on six millions, and he believes that in North Carolina and Virginia there is similar prosperity. Mr. Douglass has sanguine expectation of the benefits to be derived from the Slater fund.

A Suit for Damages against a Liquor Dealer has recently been tried in Newburg, N. Y. William Kiles, of Woodbury, a laborer, drank considerably at a liquor saloon kept by a man named O'Sullivan on the afternoon and evening of Saturday, August 18th. The next morning his dead body was found by the side of the railroad track, between Central Valley and Highland Mills stations. He had evidently been killed by the cars. His widow brought the suit against O'Sullivan, claiming that the beer he sold her husband contributed to his intoxication, which intoxication, she alleged, was the cause of Kiles's death. A verdict for $1750 was rendered against O'Sullivan.

Mr. W. Forbes is Holding Gospel Services this week at the Gospel Hall, corner of Park and Marcy Avenues, Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, of which Dr. George F. Pentecost is pastor. The mission commenced last Sunday night, when the Hall was crowded with attentive listeners. Mr. Forbes's mission in Philadelphia last week was eminently successful. Some remarkable cases occurred of rescue from the vice of drunkenness, through the power of the Saviour. Over seven hundred persons signed the pledge and assumed the Blue Ribbon. Among those who welcomed Mr. Forbes to Brooklyn is a gentleman who writes that he had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Forbes at Gainsborough, England, last year, and wishes to bear testimony to the good and lasting work Mr. Forbes was enabled to do there, when the whole city was powerfully moved, and the effects of which are still manifest among the people.

A New Seminary has been Established in Virginia by the friends of the Late Rev. Dr. Plumer, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 21st, 1881. It has been chartered as the "Plumer Memorial Female College," in honor of the distinguished divine whose name it bears. It is located at Wytheville, Va., a town on the Norfolk and Western Railroad, one hundred and thirty miles southwest of Lynchburg. Its Board of Trustees has determined to raise an endowment of $50,000 to make tuition free.

A Day of Special Prayer for Temperance in the customary week of prayer was urged by the committee of the Women's National Christian Temperance Union on the managers who arrange the topics for the week. It was announced on November 1st that the request had been rejected, and the Conference of the Women's Christian Temperance Union therefore resolved to set apart the second Tuesday in January for that purpose, and to request ministers of churches to observe the day.

A Remarkable Scene at Jerry McAuley's Cremorne Mission was witnessed recently. It is described in the excellent periodical called Jerry McAuley's Newspaper, which records the work of the mission. A few weeks ago a lady saw a young girl from Illinois weeping in a store. She spoke to her, and elicited from her the cause of her trouble. She had been brought to New York for immoral purposes and was deserted, alone and friendless. The lady called a messenger boy and directed him to take the girl to Cremorne, where she was received and was persuaded to return home. The lady went a few nights afterward to Cremorne to learn how her protégé had fared. She remained to the service, and was there deeply impressed. Ultimately she was led to the Saviour. She confessed that she was the proprietor of three houses of ill-fame in the city, and was becoming wealthy by the profits of sin. She immediately closed all the houses, sold the furniture, and gave away the proceeds, and on November 28th she was publicly baptized at the mission, and is now happy in poverty, earning her bread by the labor of her hands.

Seven Shipwrecked Sailors were Brought to New York on Saturday last by the State of Pennsylvania of the State Line. They were taken off the water-logged ship Benefactress on November 28th. The Benefactress was on her voyage from Quebec to Greenock with a cargo of timber when she experienced a series of gales, which continued from November 15th to November 17th. The ship behaved well for some time, but at length a heavy sea struck her, and she turned almost on her beam ends. The cabin and forecastle were flooded, and when the spars were cut away and the ship righted, she rolled heavily in the trough of the sea. The pumps being injured there was no means of getting rid of the water that had been shipped, and the men were consequently forced to remain on deck day and night. Their thirst was intolerable, as no water could be obtained from the casks in the hold, and they had nothing to assuage it but a few apples. Nine days they remained on the barque, which seemed about to break up under them every moment. On November 26th fifteen men resolved to leave the wreck, and in spite of the captain's protests they took the only boat left, and departed. There was a gale that night, and the captain thinks they must have perished. Two more days of anxiety were passed, and then the State of Pennsylvania came in sight and took the seven survivors off and brought them to New York. It is hoped that the boat with the fifteen men may have been picked up by a passing ship, but there is reason to fear that it was lost. It would appear that in this case, as in some spiritual cases, the wisest course was to wait for rescue rather than attempt self-deliverance (Jer. 3 : 23).

The Conversion of a Liquor Dealer and his wife was announced at a public meeting in New York last week. They at one time did a large trade, and their receipts would sometimes amount to a hundred dollars on Saturday and Sunday, for they had no conscience about Sunday or any other of God's appointments. But while they were living on the ruin of others the devil was busy plotting theirs. They virtually sank into the pit which by trade they digged for others (Proverbs 26 : 27). They became a dissipated pair and lost their business. By and by in their poverty they came to some meetings conducted in one of the lowest parts of this city in the interest of the lost. For some time they had supposed that no man cared for them, soul or body, but to their surprise they learned that they were the objects of Christian solicitude. "And now," said the gentleman who related the incident, "they are rejoicing in the saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. They give a very clear and intelligent testimony concerning their hope in Him."

A Case of Wanton Mischief is Reported. There is a dangerous wreck—that of the Nankin—sunk in New York Bay. Over the spot where it lies a gas-lighted buoy has been placed as a warning to passing vessels. The buoy consists of a small can, on the top of which is a gas-lamp, which shows a distinct light at night. The lamp is protected by heavy iron basket-work. In spite of the protection, however, the glass in the lamp was recently found by the naval inspector of buoys to be smashed, and the iron screws twisted out of place. The glass bore marks of having been punched with some sharp instrument, and the screws had evidently been turned with a screw-driver. It is thought that some person, filled with more alcohol than intelligence, has done the injury. A reward of $250 has been offered for information which will lead to the discovery of the person or persons implicated. It may be hoped that the miscreant who did the infamous deed will be discovered and punished. His mischievous prank might have caused a wreck. Moral wrecks have frequently been caused by a similar spirit of mischief (Prov. 10 : 23).

An Announcement Recently Made by an Official indicates his own kindness of heart. General Pritcher, Superintendent of the State Soldiers' Home in Bath, Steuben County, N. Y., makes public announcement of the fact that the Home is now full to its utmost capacity, and that it will he useless for men to go there expecting to get in. "I plainly see," he says, however, "that one of my most trying duties this winter will be to tell many a poor, foot-sore old fellow, who has made his way here expecting to find a shelter for the winter, that we have no room for him." It is easy to understand how the necessity of refusing such applicants admission must distress any compassionate man. The aged soldiers, too, who are thus turned away from the doors of the refuge will naturally bemoan their hard lot. The soldiers who fight under Christ's banner need be under no apprehension that a similar fate will befall them. There will be room in the refuge Jesus has provided for the poorest and the humblest (Heb. 4 : 9).

JEHOVAH HATH SPOKEN: WILL YE NOT HEAR?

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Hear ye, and give ear; be not proud: for the Lord hath spoken. . . . But if ye will not hear it, my soul shall weep in secret places for your pride; and mine eye shall weep sore, and run down with tears, because the Lord's flock is carried away captive."—JEREMIAH 13 : 15-17

IN this chapter Jeremiah had proclaimed the judgment of God against His sinful people under two very striking figures. Israel had been to God what a girdle is to a man; the people had been bound closely about Him in His great love and favor; but on account of their sin the Lord would put them away, and they should be hidden by the Euphrates till their beauty was marred; till, in fact, like a rotten girdle, their whole state had become decayed. "Thus saith the Lord, After this manner will I mar the pride of Judah, and the great pride of Jerusalem." Then He spake to them by a second parable—"Every bottle shall be filled with wine;" and He showed how God's wrath would come upon the people to fill them with a judicial drunkenness, so that they should become besotted, and in their delirium should strive one with another to their mutual undoing. The Lord declared that thus He would "dash them one against another, even the fathers and the sons together."

THUNDER-CLAPS OF JUDGMENT.

Thus, under two homely but exceedingly terrible figures, Jeremiah preached the law to the people, that they might be humbled under a sense of sin. Had they but felt the force of this teaching they would have begun to mourn for their sin, and, under dread of wrath, they would have cried for mercy. Taking it for granted that this might be the case, though, alas! it did not so happen, the Lord gave to His prophet an interval for proclaiming mercy. After those two great thunder claps of judgment came a gracious shower of grace.

The prophet, in what we may venture to call an evangelistic style, exhorts the people, and addresses to them the characteristic Gospel precept—"Hear ye, and give ear; for Jehovah hath spoken." His words remind us of Isaiah's exhortation—"Incline your ear and come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live;" and again—"Hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good." Under the Gospel "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God;" and so Jeremiah doth, as it were, in these verses preach the Gospel to the backsliding house of Judah. This is ever God's design in threatening judgment; He desires to prepare the people for His grace. I would take up the prophet's strain by the help of the Lord, praying to be a partaker of His earnest and tender Spirit. Oh, that to-day those who have never heard the voice of the Lord in the inward parts of their being may hear it and live! O Holy Spirit, work thou to that end!

I. We will enter upon our subject at once, for there is much to speak of. The first head will be this: listen, O my hearers, with deep attention, for

THERE IS A REVELATION.

Read the text—"Hear ye, and give ear; be not proud: for the Lord hath spoken." If the Lord had not spoken, the silence would have deepened and established your natural darkness, and if you had been inquiring after God your heart would have cried, "Oh, that He would break this dreadful silence!" But here you have the great source of comfort and instruction —"Jehovah hath spoken." Is not this a just call for the attention of all His creatures?

The voice which we are bidden to hear is a divine voice, it is the voice of Him that made the heavens and the earth, whose creatures we are. Jehovah hath spoken! If it were but the voice of prophets apart from their Master, it might be but a slight sin to refuse what they say; but since Jehovah hath spoken, shall men dare to be deaf to Him? The sacred Scriptures are the record of what God hath spoken: receive them with the reverence which they deserve as coming from God only, and as being, therefore, pure truth, fixed certainty, and unerring right.

It is a word most clear and plain, for Jehovah hath spoken. He might have taught us only by the works of His hands, in which the invisible things of God, even His eternal power and Godhead are clearly seen. What is all creation but a hieroglyphic scroll, in which the Lord has written out His character as Creator and Provider? But since He knew that we were dim of sight and dull of comprehension, the Lord has gone beyond the symbols and hieroglyphs, and used articulate speech such as a man useth with his fellow: Jehovah hath spoken!

Moreover, I gather from the expression in the text that the revelation made to us by the Lord is an unchangeable and abiding word. We are not living in a period of gradual revelation, as some imagine; Jehovah hath spoken, and He openeth not His mouth a second time. He hath closed the canon of Scripture with a curse upon him that shall add to or take from the words of the book of this prophecy. Jehovah hath spoken! Beloved, this revelation is pre-eminently a condescending and cheering word. The very fact that the great God speaks to us by His Son indicates that mercy, tenderness, love, hope, grace, are

THE BURDEN OF HIS UTTERANCE.

His Son Jesus is full of grace and truth, and therefore that which He now speaks to us is not only truth, but grace; it is truthful grace and gracious truth which God speaks to us by Jesus Christ. Oh, the richness of that message, the height and depth of love which it contains! Who can refuse to listen to the heavenly music of mercy?

If all workmen should throw down their tools, and say, "We will hear what God the Lord shall speak," and if merchants should close their shops and counting-houses for awhile, and come together without delay crying, "Everything must stop till we have heard what the Lord hath spoken;" would it be any more than right reason would suggest to thoughtful and right-minded men? O sirs, if God has spoken, every ear should surrender itself to attention, for surely never could the sense of hearing be more honorably and profitably employed.

II. Secondly—and I have already anticipated it—since there is a revelation, it should be

SUITABLY RECEIVED.

If Jehovah hath spoken, then all attention should be given; yea, double attention, even as the text hath it, "Hear ye, and give ear." Oh, brothers, I fear that we give far more attention to the distracting voices of the world than to the soul-satisfying voice of the God of all grace. How eager men are after the treasure which melts before their eyes—how they will drink in every syllable by which they may learn how to be rich; but when God speaketh, who brings in both His hands eternal and abiding riches, men are deaf as the adder, careless as the beasts of the field. He saith, "I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded." Is this right or wise? Surely, if Jehovah speaks we are bound by all that is just, and good, and grateful to wait in reverent silence till we know His mind. Let a general hush go through the universe, and let all ears with solemn reverence await the sound of the voice of the Lord.

Then it is added, as if by way of directing us how suitably to hear this revelation—"Give glory to Jehovah your God." There ought to be in hearing and reading the revelation of God a constant giving of glory to the Lord. His speaking is a manifestation of His glory, as when the sun ariseth his light is spread abroad; you and I are to reflect that light even as the valleys rejoice in his brightness of the noontide. Let us stand, as it were, this morning to be shone upon by the Lord, ready every one of us, to reflect that light which cometh from on high. Give glory to God at once by worthily hearing His Gospel. How is that to be done?

Stand thou still, and hear the word of the Lord. Glorify the Lord by accepting whatsoever He saith unto thee as being infallibly true. Believe in the Lord your God, so shall ye be established; believe His prophets, so shall ye prosper. Know what the Lord has said, and let it stand to thee as sure and steadfast truth. Seek for no further reasons to sustain thy faith; but let "Thus saith the Lord" stand to thee in the stead of all arguments. In these days this virtue is lightly esteemed, for the Saviour's words are still true—"He that loveth Me not keepeth not My sayings." In all its length and breadth, whatsoever the Lord saith we believe; and we desire to know neither less nor more than He has spoken.

We must receive the word, however, in a hearty and honest manner so as to act upon it. We must therefore repent of the sin which the Lord condemns, and turn from the way which He abhors; we must loathe the vice which He forbids us, and seek after the virtue which He commands. We give glory to God when we

that we have broken His holy law, and grieve because we have so done. But we must go further than repentance and the acceptance of the truth as truth, we must further reverence the gracious voice of God when He bids us believe on Christ and live. He has couched that message of love in so blessed a form that He who does not accept it must be wantonly malicious against God and against his own soul. For the Lord does not demand that by penances and acts of mortification, and feelings of misery and despair, we are to purge ourselves from sin; but He has graciously declared—"He that believeth on Him is not condemned." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." If Jehovah has spoken in such a manner, if the sum and substance of what He has spoken is that "God hath set forth His Son Jesus Christ to be a propitiation through faith in His blood," then we must and will give ear to Him.

There is no part of God's word at which the human mind should kick. If our hearts were in a right state we should fling open all the doors of our mind, and say, "Come in, O sacred truth, come in! Thou art welcome to my heart of hearts since thou comest from my God." If Jehovah speaks ought we not instead of cavilling, and questioning, and disputing, and raising difficulties, just to say, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth?" When the Lord says to us, "Seek ye My face," our heart should at once reply, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek." I think that point is clear. There is a revelation, and that revelation ought to be suitably received.

THE OBSTACLE.

III. But thirdly, pride in the human heart prevents such a reception. The text runs, "Hear ye, and give ear; be not proud: for the Lord hath spoken." And further on the prophet says—"If ye will not hear it, my soul shall weep in secret places for your pride." The prophet here puts his finger upon the blot. Why is it, my dear hearers, that there are any among you this day who have heard God's word year after year and yet have not received it? The secret reason is your pride. Perhaps pride prompts you indignantly to deny the accusation.

In some it is the pride of intellect. They do not wish to be treated like children; they are not content to receive the kingdom of God as a little child, and so when Jesus says, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven," they reply that they intend to think out a Gospel for themselves. To lay the inventiveness of thought on one side, and simply to believe what Jesus teaches, is not to their mind; they will not humble themselves to a fact so little self-exalting. Well, sirs, if you shut the door of the kingdom against yourselves because you are too wise to enter, be this known unto you, that the poor have the Gospel preached to them, and that they receive it. If you will destroy yourself to indulge your own conceit, well, so it must be; but the day shall come in which your regret shall know neither measure nor end. Oh, let none of us be so proud as to lift up ourselves in opposition to that which Jehovah hath spoken!

In some others it is the pride of self-esteem. "No," say they, "this Gospel which we have heard so often is too simple—we are capable of something more elaborate." We care not to be we care not to be freely forgiven as those who have nothing to pay. That no composition will be accepted, not even a farthing in the pound of our own merit—is a doctrine too lowering to our dignity." They set the Gospel on one side because it sets them on one side. They are too great to be saved. God save us from such folly. It may well make us weep to think that any man should be so far gone astray from right reason as to throw away eternal bliss in order to walk with haughty steps through this poor life.

Some have a pride of self-righteousness. They are good, they have kept the commandments from their youth up; they have attended to religion, they have seen to it that all rites and ceremonies have been duly performed upon them, and they thank God that they are not as other men are. This righteousness of theirs is a garment respectable enough for them to wear, and therefore they reject the righteousness of God. O ye proud, I would to God ye knew that ye are naked, and poor, and miserable. While sin ruins many in the outside world, I fear self-righteousness ruins more among those who attend places of worship. They say "we see," and therefore their eyes are not opened; they cry "we are clean," and therefore they are not washed from their iniquity.

In some, too, it is the pride of self-love. They cannot deny their lusts. To cut off right-hand sins, and pluck out right-eye iniquities, cannot be endured by them. Their hearts are set upon a certain evil pleasure, and they cannot give it up. The Gospel of Jesus Christ demands of those who receive it that they shall be saved not in their sins, but from their sins; it comes to give us renewal as well as rest, purity as well as pardon, sanctity as well as safety; and there are many who, because of their foolish self-indulgence, cannot deny themselves any seeming joy, but must needs fill themselves with the poisoned sweets which delight the flesh. O friend, I wish that this pride were taken from thee, and that it seemed wisdom to thee to deny thyself life itself for the present rather than miss the hope of life eternal.

The pride of self-will also works its share of ruin among men. "Who is the Lord, that I should obey His voice?" is the cry of many beside Pharaoh. The unrenewed heart virtually says—"I shall not mind these commands. Why should I be tied hand and foot, and ruled, and governed? I intend to be a free thinker and a free liver, and I will not submit myself." Just so, and you are free to lose all hope of heaven, my friend, free to destroy yourself. If this be your choice, then who is to hinder you in it! I know that I cannot. Oh, that the Lord will lead you to a better mind. Who is to blame but yourself? So I pass from mournfully considering this great evil which prevents the revelation of God from being properly received.

IV. Fourthly, hence there comes

AN EARNEST WARNING.

The prophet has put it—"Give glory to the Lord your God, before He cause darkness, and before your feet stumble upon the dark mountains." I desire to explain this with deep humiliation of spirit on my own part, and with much trembling lest any one of you should ever by experience know the truth of these words. Listen, my friend, thou who hast rejected God and His Christ till now. Thou art already out of the way, among the dark mountains. There is a King's highway of faith, and thou hast refused it; thou hast turned aside to the right hand or to the left, according to thine own imagination.

Being out of the way of safety, thou art in the path of danger even now. Though the sunlight shines about thee, and the flowers spring up profusely under thy feet, yet thou art in danger, for there is no safety out of the King's road. If thou wilt walk according to His bidding thou shalt be quiet from fear of danger, for no lion shall be there; but inasmuch as thou art now thine own keeper and thine own law, and thou followest in thine own ways, thou art in great peril. The unbeliever is condemned already, because he has not believed on the Son of God. Escape, I pray thee, while thou mayest, and enter upon that one road which is strait and narrow, but leadeth unto life eternal—the way of faith in Jesus.

If thou wilt still pursue thy headlong career, and choose a path for thyself, I pray thee remember that around thee. The day is far spent! Around thy soul there are hanging mists and glooms already, and these will thicken into the night-damps of bewilderment. Thinking but not believing, thou wilt soon think thyself into a horror of great darkness. Refusing to hear what Jehovah has spoken, thou wilt follow other voices, which shall allure thee into an Egyptian night of confusion. Thou wilt go on meditating and excogitating, or criticising and trifling, till thou art enveloped in a cloud of doubts, wrapped as in a dense smoke of speculation, and well-nigh smothered in exhalations of unbelief. Thou shalt not know what to do, nor what to think, nor what to say, nor whither to betake thyself, for thou wilt have renounced thy guide and quenched thy torch.

Meanwhile, there shall overcloud thee a darkness bred of thine own sin and wilfulness. Thou shalt lose the brightness of thine intellect, the sharp clearness of thy thought shall depart from thee, professing thyself to be wise thou shalt become a fool. For after that darkness there comes as saith the text, "before your feet stumble upon the dark mountains." He who is going to think out his own way apart from revelation, will meet with mysteries which he cannot surmount. There are mysteries in revelation, but these rise before us like hills of light; while to those who trifle with the word of the Lord there shall arise mountains of gloom. I care not what philosophy you take, whether it be old or new, openly profane or faintly sprinkled with Christianity, you will never get rid of mystery—it is essential to the limited capacity of the human mind confronted by boundless truth.

There are also dark mountains of another kind which will block the way of the wanderer—mountains of dismay, of remorse, of despair. Woe to that man who finds himself travelling at midnight, without a guide, without a road, amid tremendous mountains, impassable to human feet. Ah, when a man comes into the land of doubt, which is a land of darkness, as darkness itself, and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness—how terrible his case! I say no more—thank God, my hearers, you are not there yet! Therefore hearken to Jehovah's voice, and give glory to God ere He send a thick darkness over all your soul, even darkness that may be felt, and your feet stumble, never to rise again.

After that stumbling there will come

BITTER DISAPPOINTMENT.

The man finding that he cannot discover his way sits down awhile, and says to himself, "I will wait till the moon rises, or the day dawns. Many before me have come to a pause; no doubt light will come." He looks and looks and looks again, but all in vain, for thus saith the prophet, "While ye look for light, he turns it into the shadow of death." Dread word—death! Terrible shade which death casts over men's minds! That shadow is coming on the man as years advance, and he has no light with which to dispel it. The physician cannot remove the death shadow—the disease is incurable.

I do not know what may ever happen to me in this life; perhaps it shall come to pass that I may be visited with severe physical infirmities, and possibly these may cause me mental depression and anguish; but this one thing I know, I have committed my mind, my heart, my whole intellectual nature to His keeping who has promised to preserve His own. I desire to believe nothing but what He tells me, to do nothing but what He bids me, and to yield myself to no influence but that which He ordains for my direction; and, therefore, it seems to me that having done this for many a day I can with unstaggering confidence say at the last, "Father, into Thy hand I commit my spirit." Believing in God I am not fearful of the future. Neither dark mountains nor dark death can cause the believer to stumble, for he cries, "I know whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day." But oh, if God be true, what will become of you who will not hear Him? If the Bible be true, what must be your portion who pretend to be wiser than the Holy Ghost? You must assuredly wander into that endless captivity from which there can be no redemption.

V. So now I have to close, but not till I have delivered my burdened heart once more. If the people would not submit to God, the prophet determined what he would do. There remains for but one resort. The loving prophet cries, "If ye will not hear it, my soul shall weep in secret places for your pride; and mine eyes shall weep sore, and run down with tears, because the Lord's flock is carried away captive." He cannot do anything more, he has no other message to deliver. He cannot hope that God will brook their insults and invent another way of saving them. He has told them the truth, and if they refuse it he will lay no flattering unction to their souls. He will deliver the word of the Lord once more, and if they again refuse he will go home to mourn for them.

He could not help those who would not be helped by God. If they refused to hear, he does not speak to them of "a larger hope" yet to be revealed, another season of probation, or a future revelation which would override the present world. Ah no, he loved men too well to invent for them fools' paradises; he dared not imitate the old serpent in the garden by insinuating—"Ye shall not surely die." I fear that the garments of many modern divines are steeped in the blood of souls whom they are deluding with their "larger hope," which is but a larger snare of Satan. Jeremiah had a brave though tender heart; he did not truckle to men, and sing pretty ditties to them, as preachers nowadays are prone to do; but he told them they would stumble in the darkness, and that nothing remained for him but to sigh out his soul over their ruin.

What a burden it is that so many should cause us this

for if men turned to God our joy would exceed all bounds. O my hearers, why will you distress me? Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die? What excuse can you urge for your folly in choosing to perish? What motive can be strong enough to make you leap into the fire when Christ is waiting to be gracious to you? We have labor enough in preparing and delivering our weighty messages, without the added grief of seeing you reject them to your own destruction. Our throes of heart are sometimes grievous enough before we preach a sermon lest we should not preach aright; why must we be driven to this further misery? We exhaust ourselves while pleading with you; why should we have to sit down in sorrow because you will not believe our report? O blessed Spirit of God, touch all hearts this day, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Jeremiah 13: 1–17; John 1: 1–18.]

SAVED, SO AS BY FIRE!

By the Rev. J. C. Whitmore.

"WHO'S got a copper for poor Peter? I'll stand on my head! or give you a dance! or sing you a comic song for a copper, or a drop o' beer. Now, who's going to throw the first copper into the old hat toward getting a dinner for poor Peter?"

Hungering and despised, weary and sick at heart—yet "no man gave unto him." Some looked upon him with a half-smile of pitying forbearance, regarding him as scarcely a responsible being; others, especially the younger men, made no attempt to hide their disgust at his presence, but openly bade him go and leave them to eat in peace the dinner they had earned. Amid all, he stood bearing with a sickly attempt at laughter the hard words and coarse hints directed against him.

With the same sickly smile upon his face, he passed out upon his wretched way. From house to house poor Peter went upon his miserable, profitless way; meeting everywhere with the same contemptuous treatment, the same scornful rejection. As the day closed, and night came, he sought his miserable home. It was in a narrow court at the end of a filthy lane. He entered the open door of one of the houses—always left open night and day, for the sufficient reason that the whole house contained nothing worth stealing. He ascended a narrow staircase, and passed into a close, dimly-lighted room, which filth and squalor made rife with fever and death. There were dirty bundles of mingled straw and rags, intended for beds, in three of the four corners of the room; an old broken table, two chairs without seats, one old saucepan and a little crockery—and this was home!

Without a word of greeting he sat down, ignorant and careless whether his wife and children had been fed during his absence; and he began to prepare for rest. His toil-worn wife glanced keenly at him from under her bent brow, and then timidly said, "There's a bad message concerning Nellie, Peter; she must have caught the fever when she came here last week. I went down to see her this afternoon; but a boy came late this evening to say she was very bad and wanted you to go and see her." As the poor wife spoke, she looked up fearfully, as if uncertain in what manner such unwelcome intelligence would be received.

He made no reply, but replaced his worn shoes upon his weary feet, and went forth into the sharp night. Shivering with cold as the bleak wind met him, he steadily, and for a time silently, held upon his way. At length he began muttering, "Nellie! Nellie! down with the fever! I'd sooner it had been all the others together! Poor Peter's one lamb, the despised drunkard's last hold and hope in life! Nellie down! bright-eyed Nellie! I wish I knew there was a God! I'd pray to Him and ask Him to spare Nellie to me; but I haven't believed in any God for years; if I had, I shouldn't be as I am now! But Nellie always loved me; when all the rest ran away afraid, Nellie never did; she came the closer, and looked up—wondering what mad devil had got into father, but certain it would not hurt her. And I never did beat little Nellie, drunk or sober! Haven't I gone hungry myself many a time with little Nellie's halfpenny loaf safe in my pocket? And I know I drank harder, because I missed her so, when she went away from me to service. Why didn't I, why couldn't I, keep sober, and have little Nellie with me at home?"

Struggling on as fast as he was able, and muttering fitfully to himself as heavy gusts of rain fell on him, he went through the darkness and cold until he reached the house where his daughter had found much kindness and a good home as a servant. Nellie was lying as if exhausted, her face colorless, her lips black and swollen, and her breathing hard and difficult. A low, wild cry that he could not repress broke from him; and then his face was covered by his hands, as he sank upon his knees by the bedside.

The sound roused the dying girl; she looked wildly and unconsciously around until her eyes met the shrinking figure by the bedside. Then thought and the old love returned to her; she gently raised the bowed head until it rested upon her hot, laboring bosom; and his arms were flung around her with an intensity that said he knew not how to let her go.

"Leave me alone with father a little while, nurse, dear," said Nellie; "I have something I must say to him before I go." The woman left the room silently; and they were alone.

"Father! darling father!" she said, her arms clinging lovingly round his neck, "I am dying, and I want you to pray to our Father in heaven for me!"

A low groan that seemed wrung from the depths of a breaking heart was the only reply he was able to give; but it caused the fever-glittering eyes to fix more intently upon him, and the hot arms to tighten around him as she spoke again. "I want you to think of our old home, father, where you used to twine my hair round your fingers as I climbed upon your knee, and so remember how you always loved Nellie! I wish such times may come again, though I shall not be with you; and so I ask you to pray for me and yourself too."

With an outburst of sobs and tears, that shook the dying girl as a leaf in the autumn wind, her father for the first time in a long life uttered words of earnest prayer to God. He gasped forth, "God in heaven, have mercy upon my darling and upon me!" The barriers once broken down, the pent-up deluge burst forth. With his daughter's arms around him, her hot breath upon his tear-stained cheek, there the poor drunkard pleaded earnestly for mercy; and though the words were labored and interrupted, they were earnest and heartfelt—and they were heard.

A few days, and what had been Nellie was laid in a green spot until the great awakening. Peter fought the hard strife—and conquered; clinging to his work, to Nellie's Bible, and to prayer. Among the vilest he goes upon his way, speaking of Jesus, of Nellie, and of hope; himself a living Gospel to the drunkard, a breathing proof of the infinite willingness of the Son of God to rescue and to save.

A JOURNEY IN THE OLD TIMES.

"Only twenty minutes more," the driver said, and his words fell on the ears of the two passengers on the box beside him with significance. But the emotions they awaken differ widely. The two—father and son—are about to be permanently separated. The young man to pursue a business career in the great city, the father to labor on his farm as he had done for thirty years past. The separation has spread gloom in a happy family circle, but it had to be made. The boy has a fine opening, and mother and father were willing he should take it. The mother's good-by was said nearly twelve hours before at the door of the farm. Now it is the father's turn, for he has accompanied his son a day's journey on his road. A few words in a choking voice are quickly said, and the two have parted, the son to continue his journey, the father to await the passing of the coach homeward.

The coachman understands well enough the boy's sensations, and is not surprised that his short answers are uttered in a voice husky with tears. How many similar partings had he seen! He is accustomed to it, but it had not blunted his sympathies, and he says a few kindly words of encouragement to the boy at his side.

How many of us can remember such a parting scene. Thirty, forty, fifty years have passed away since then, but as we think of it we feel the nipping air in our faces, see the passing country from our elevation, the backs of four good horses are in front, and the tune the coachman is humming sounds in our ears. Ah! that scene was of long ago, how much has passed since then! But the old coach and its team still have a tender spot in our memory.

BEATRICE GREY'S MOMENTOUS RIDE.

A True Incident.

"And so you are going to be married next week, Miss Grey? I most sincerely wish you all the happiness you deserve." The speaker was a real estate agent, and he addressed a young lady who had ridden over from her father's farm in the country to give some instructions to the agent which had been submitted to her decision by her affianced husband. He was absent in a distant State, but he was coming back soon to be married and to live in the neighborhood.

"Yes, I am going to be married, Mr. Bertram," was the reply. "I cannot say that I have very sanguine hopes of excessive happiness, but I dare say we shall be as happy as other married couples. It is a kind of lottery, you know. I fancy there are not many utter blanks nor many great prizes."

"Well, I hope you will have one of the prizes. I know your husband will have one, and I hope he will appreciate it as he ought."

"Oh, it is late in the day for you to pay compliments," said Beatrice Grey, with a blush and a smile which showed that the flattery was not distasteful to her. "I suppose Mr. Lovell thought me a prize or he would not have taken the trouble to win me. At any rate, he showed his admiration in a more practical way than some people did."

"That is a very unkind thrust at a very old friend, Miss Beatrice," said the young man. "I should have expected sympathy not reproaches from you at such a time as this. You are cruel."

"No, I am not cruel, I only speak the truth, Mr. Bertram, and we have known each other so long that we can afford to speak truthfully to each other. I think Mr. Lovell's homage is more practical than that shown by empty compliments. But I must go or it will be dark before I get through the wood, and then I shall be scared."

"If you will permit me, I should be delighted to accompany you home, Miss Grey. It may be the last opportunity we shall have of private conversation, for after you are married your husband may not approve of our friendship, and there are some things I should like to explain to you."

"Be quick, then, and have your horse around, for I do not want to be late."

The horse was soon at the door, and Fred Bertram, as idle and unprincipled a man as ever lived, was cantering away at the side of the woman who had fascinated him for years.

"Tell me, Beatrice," he said, "why you chose Lovell for a husband? I should not have expected you two of being smitten with each other."

"Oh, we women do not choose for ourselves. Men come around and view us as if we were slaves in a market, and if they approve they make us an offer, and we can accept it or not; but if we refuse we may stay at home all our lives and never be asked again. That would not suit me. Mr. Lovell is a worthy man, he has a good income, and he likes me, and I have accepted him, and there is an end of it."

"Pardon me, Beatrice, not the end; the beginning I should rather say. And not a very hopeful beginning, either. I do not see how you can be happy on such terms. And apart from that, Lovell being so sedate and dull and religious, he will be a perpetual reproach to you. He will not let you dance, or go to the theatre, or even laugh above your breath. You will be miserable."

"No, it will not be so bad as that," said Beatrice, "but I expect I shall be dull."

Bertram rode close to his companion's side, and bending down whispered a few words in her ear. She looked up at him with a flushed face, and shook her head, but before that ride was over the vain, pleasure-loving little woman had consented to break her promise to her lover and become the wife of Fred Bertram.

Many years have passed away since those two faithless ones rode together under the trees. They have been years of trial and sorrow for both. They began a life of pleasure and frivolity which lasted but a year or two. Then came poverty, sickness, children whom neither parent knew how to train, and at last death separated them. The injured lover still lives, and the sight of his happy home with a wife who loved and honored him added to the remorse Beatrice experienced as she thought of the sterling gold she had rejected for the tinsel of vain show.

Interview between Wilberforce and Wesley.

VISIT OF WILBERFORCE TO WESLEY.

NEARLY a century ago the interview occurred which is depicted in the illustration on this page. The scene was the old house attached to the Chapel in the City Road, London. The two men, attired in the quaint garb of that time, were men whose influence in their own day was immense, and extends in ever widening circles into our time. It was an interview between William Wilberforce and John Wesley. The former, by his persistent efforts, continued during twenty years, succeeded in inducing his countrymen to abolish slavery in the British dominions by fair and peaceable means. His more violent followers would have had an act of emancipation passed setting the slaves free at the expense of the slaveholders; but Wilberforce regarded the project as one of spoliation, and resisted the advocates of it. He contended that as the law had sanctioned the right of property in slaves it was due to those who had embarked in speculations depending on that sanction being continued that they should receive compensation for the loss which must ensue. The slaveholders were compensated at the expense of the nation, and the slaves were set free.

The visit to Wesley occurred on February 24th, 1789, just prior to the session in which Wilberforce first proposed to the House of Commons the abolition of the slave trade. It is not known what passed at that interview, but there is reason to believe that the conversation was a serious and earnest one. John Wesley's account of it is this: "Mr. Wilberforce called upon me, and we had an agreeable and useful conversation. What a blessing it is to Mr. Pitt to have such a friend as this!" The notice in Wilberforce's diary is as brief: "I called upon John Wesley—a fine old fellow. The bustle and hurry of life sadly distract and destroy me. Alas, alas, I must mend! May God enable me!" Wilberforce was then under thirty years of age, but he had already given evidence of his marvellous powers. In all the brilliant circle of wits and statesmen which he frequented there was no member of it whose conversation exercised so potent a charm over all who listened to it as did that of Wilberforce. Even Sydney Smith, the prince of wits, did not eclipse him, and there was no greater conversational enjoyment for the foremost men of that time than to get the two wits together and to listen to their good-humored jokes and repartees. All who knew Wilberforce at that time predicted for him a brilliant future.

The young member of Parliament had indeed a brilliant future before him, but its brilliance was of a character utterly different from that expected by his friends. About the time of his interview with Wesley a change came over him which completely revolutionized his life. We know from his diary, published some years after his death, that he was under deep concern about salvation when he went to see Wesley, but that he had not then found the light. The entry in Wesley's diary, however, shows that the great preacher saw reason for hope that the light would come to the earnest seeker.

Wilberforce was first aroused from the gaiety and frivolity of his life of pleasure while on a tour through Europe. He and an intimate friend were travelling together, when a book fell into their hands which powerfully moved them both. It was "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," by Doddridge. They read it together, and from that they proceeded to the study of the Greek Testament. The Spirit of God blessed that study, and Wilberforce hurried home to get spiritual advice from the most eminent theologians of the day. John Newton especially he desired to see, and it was to John Newton more than any other that the great emancipator owed under God the emancipation of his own soul.

After his conversion Wilberforce had to decide an important question. He was in doubt as to whether he ought to abandon his Parliamentary career and devote himself to the preaching of the Gospel. He considered the matter carefully and prayerfully, and ultimately decided that his opportunities for usefulness would be greater in his own sphere than in any other. It was like the duty "of beginning at Jerusalem," to begin Christian work and to lead a Christian life in that godless circle. But Wilberforce did it by the help of God. Two objects Wilberforce set before himself—"the Reformation of Manners" and "the Abolition of the Slave Trade," and to these he devoted his long and useful life. He was throughout encouraged, at various crises of his career, and at times when after defeat his spirit was sinking within him, by letters from Wesley urging him to go on in the good fight.

POVERTY'S PREY.

A SERIAL STORY.

In New Quarters.

EUCLID'S dense ignorance of Scripture truth might have appalled some men, but Mr. Dudley was a constant visitor in the slums of a great city, and he was too much accustomed to the darkness to be found there to be greatly surprised. He was surprised, however, for the spectacle of the old man standing in court and appealing to the judge for mercy on the prisoner who had robbed him of all his poor savings, had led the listener to think such magnanimity must be the product of religion. Euclid's answer, however, proved that religion had nothing to do with it. But Mr. Dudley realized how such a man would be impressed with religious truth. He resolved, therefore, to discover how much or rather how little Euclid did know.

"Do you know nothing of our Lord Jesus Christ?" asked Mr. Dudley.

"I've heard the name," he said reflectively. "Oh, yes, of course I've heard the name; but I've had no time to inquire into such things, and they puzzle my head when I hear talk of them. Jesus Christ! Ay, I do know the name well, sir. My wife knew all about Him, I dare say. She died when Victoria were born. Poor dear! She could say texts and hymns—lots as I forgot; but some on 'em I remembered long enough to teach 'em to Victoria. Victoria, my dear, do you know anythink o' Lord Jesus Christ?"

"Not much, father," she answered tremulously, and leaning forward with her pale, eager face in gaze at the stranger, who was beginning to talk about what she had often longed to hear.

"You've heard of Queen Victoria?" said Mr. Dudley.

"Ay!" answered Euclid, "there's a many streets and taverns called after her."

"If you heard," continued the stranger in a very quiet, yet clear, impressive voice, "that Queen Victoria was so filled with trouble and sorrow for folks like you, that she had sent her own son, and that he had quite willingly left the splendid and beautiful palace where they live, to come and live in this street here among you, working for his own bread like all of you are doing, and spending all his spare time in teaching the children, and nursing the sick people, and helping the neighbors in every way he could, never growing tired of them, but trying to make them as good as himself, what would you think of him?"

"I'd lay my hands under his feet!" cried Bess in an eager tone.

"There'd be no goodness like that in this world!" said Euclid.

"And if he went on," continued Mr. Dudley, "week after week, month after month, and year after year, never going home to his mother's palace, only sending messages to her from time to time, because he was bent upon making you all as good and as happy as himself, and fitting you to go and live with him as his friends in his own palace; and if some of you loved him, but most of you hated him, and those who hated him raised a mob against him, and killed him, and he had only time to send a last message to Queen Victoria, and the message was, 'Mother, forgive them: they do not know what they are doing,' what should you say to that?"

"There never was such goodness!" exclaimed Euclid, while Victoria's dark eyes were fastened on the stranger.

"Suppose he was even now in the street, and you heard his voice calling, 'Come to me, all you that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest!' would you go to him?" asked Mr. Dudley.

"I'd follow him to the end of the world!" answered old Euclid, striking his hands together, and half rising from his seat, as if to start instantly on his pilgrimage.

"That's one o' mother's texts," said Victoria in a timid voice.

"Yes," continued Mr. Dudley, "they are the words of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Did you never hear this: 'There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repents?' Do you think that is true?"

"Ay, it must be true," answered Euclid; "for my wife's gone to heaven, and she'll have joy, I know, over Roger, if he turns out good."

"Those are the words of Jesus Christ, the Son of God," said Mr. Dudley. "And now, if you could look down into the street, and see such a man as we spoke of, the queen's son, looking round him sorrowfully on the drunken men and miserable women and wretched children here, and you could hear him say, 'I am come to seek and to save those who are lost,' should you believe him?"

"I should! I should!" said Euclid, with tears in his dim old eyes.

"Jesus Christ said that," continued Mr. Dudley. "And if you could hear Him say to you and Victoria and Bess, 'Let not your hearts be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In my Father's house there is plenty of room; I am going to prepare a place for you all. And, if I go, I will come again, and take you there myself, that where I am you may be also.' Tell me, what would you say to that?"

"God bless Him!" cried old Euclid, sobbing; while Victoria's eyes shone with a bright light, and Bess listened with parted lips.

"The very night before His enemies killed Him, Jesus Christ said that, and left it as a message to every one who should believe in Him," said Mr. Dudley. "What a pity you have not known Him all your lives! 'God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' If you could read, Euclid, there is a small book which tells us all we know of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; and all He said and did is as true for us now, as it was then, before His enemies rose against Him, and crucified Him."

"I'm afeard I'm too old to learn now," said Euclid regretfully; "but Victoria there has plenty o' time, if anybody 'ud teach her; and, if she's not a-goin' to die soon, it 'ud be company for her to have that little book. And Bess must learn somehow. I never knew as Jesus Christ said anythink like that, 'Come to Me, poor laborin' folks, when your load's heavy, and I'll give you rest;' and 'There's joy in heaven over sinners when they repent;' and 'I'm come to find and save lost folks;' ay, and all the other words you've told us. 'They don't know what they're doin'.' Ah! that's true. It's true of me, and true o' Blackett and Roger and all on us! No, no! we don't know what we're doin'!"

"I'll find some one to teach Victoria and Bess," said the stranger; "and Roger will be well taught. He is going down the river to the ship Cleopatra, where he will be trained for a seaman, and taught how to read and write. I thought you would be glad to know that."

"Oh, if Davy could only ha' gone where Roger's goin'!" said Bess sorrowfully.

Mr Dudley listened attentively to the story of David Fell's crimes against his country and her laws, and the measure of stripes meted out for them; and, learning the name of the jail where he was now imprisoned, he went away, promising to see them again soon.

John Dudley went away with a heavier heart than when he came to bring good news of Roger. If one boy was saved, the other seemed irretrievably lost. He knew too well one inevitable result of sending boys to prison—the forfeiture of their only wealth, the wealth of a good name. If David came out of jail neither degraded nor corrupted by contact with confirmed criminals—a thing he hardly dared to hope—he would still bear about with him, at the very beginning of his life, the stigma of being a convict and a felon!

Dudley's blood boiled and his heart ached with mingled indignation and sorrow, as he paced slowly along the narrow and dirty street which had been at once David Fell's school and playground. Scarcely a decent man or woman met his eye, and his ear heard oaths and speeches such as had been the common language surrounding David from his earliest childhood. Yet what had the boy been guilty of? Untaught, untrained, with no instruction but the vile and coarse lessons of a London slum, he had kept true to the only faith he had—his faith in an honest and industrious father. He had striven to his utmost to be honest and industrious, and he had not failed. His crimes had been—begging for his mother when she was dying of hunger; and resenting—hotly, perhaps, but bravely—an insult to his mother's good name, when that was maligned by the man who had robbed her.

Misery and degradation and crime lay all about Dudley as he turned homeward; and for the moment it seemed a hopeless task to endeavor to raise this dead mass of a city's lowest population from its ignorance and savagery. And what if the law did not aid him? If the best of these young barbarians, yielding to his natural instincts, broke the laws he did not know, and was arrested by a Christian people, not to be wisely and gently dealt with, but to be set forevermore against society, every man's hand against him, and his hand against every man, what chance was there for him and his fellow-laborers to work any deliverance?

John Dudley paced along the streets, deep in thought, yet taking unconscious notice of the groups of loafing, ill-fed, ill-clad lads who thronged the causeways. His mind was pondering over a book he had been reading lately—a very popular book, which has been a favorite with the people. It was "Tom Brown's School-Days." The school was Rugby; the head master, Dr. Arnold, a man called to his post by God Himself, and set there as a pattern and example to all schoolmasters. Every boy in the school was the son of a well-to-do, if not a wealthy, father. But, oh, the scrapes those boys got into, and got out of! the crimes against English law they committed! Had the same measure been meted to them that every day was meted to these desolate, degraded, uncared-for street-lads, how many a brave and worthy gentleman—ay, and magistrate—of the present day must now have been a gray-haired convict in penal servitude!

He had known boys and girls under fifteen years of age sent to jail for breaking down a rotten fence; for throwing a stone, and unintentionally breaking a window; for snatching an apple off a stall, or a penny loaf out of a baker's shop; or for stealing a few turnips from a field, and a handful of corn from a sheaf. But what were these trespasses compared with many committed, day after day, by schoolboys in every school in the kingdom? No doubt the schoolboys were punished; but they were not cast, in the name of law and justice, into a gulf from which there was no clear escape in this life.

By and by his thoughts turned to old Euclid. It was quite plain that he must move away from his garret, now Blackett's hatred was so greatly provoked. But where must he go? Could nothing better be found than that miserable attic, with its thin roof of slates and lath-and-plaster ceiling, as the sole shelter against the frosts and snows of winter and the hot sun of summer? No wonder that girl looked like a ghost, with her small, wan face, and emaciated frame! Could nothing be done for them?

At last his face brightened, and he turned hastily southward, toward the river. He went on nearly to the docks, and then entered a short and quiet street. A fresh breeze blew up from the water, chilly enough this February night, but giving promise of a pleasant air on a summer's day. He paused at a little store with miscellaneous wares displayed in a bay-window with small panes, and with a door divided across the middle, the upper part of which was open. As he pushed open the lower part, a sharp little bell tinkled loudly, and in an instant an elderly woman appeared in the doorway of an inner room.

"I'm coming in, Mrs. Linnett," he said.

The small kitchen beyond the shop was scantily furnished with an arm-chair cushioned with home-made patchwork, two Windsor chairs, a table, and a kitchen-piece, combining a chest of drawers with a cupboard. But the walls were decorated with many cheap foreign curiosities; and over the fireplace hung a highly colored engraving of a three-master, all sails full set, and four little black figures, representing the crew, standing at equal distances along the bulwarks. A burning mountain in the distance, in a terrific state of eruption, and the intense blue of the sea and sky, suggested the Bay of Naples. Underneath were the words, "Barque Jemima; master, Thomas Linnett."

There was no light in the little kitchen, except that of the fire; but there was enough to show the placid and pleasant face of Mrs. Linnett, though it was partially concealed by a green shade over her eyes. John Dudley smiled as he looked at her.

"I think I've found you a little maid," he said, "and a lodger, if I pay a small portion of his rent. He's an honest old fellow, or I'm much mistaken; and he gets his living by selling water-cresses."

"It's a poor trade," remarked Mrs. Linnett tranquilly.

"He's as poor as a man can be, and keep off the parish," continued Mr. Dudley; "and he has a daughter very sickly, who will grow well and happy with a little mothering such as you will give to her. And there's a strong bright girl, whom they have adopted, and who is the little maid I spoke of."

"Three of 'em!" said Mrs. Linnett.

"You like to have plenty of folks about you," he answered persuasively: "and by and by the elder girl will help you to keep shop, and Bess will clean and scrub, and you will be at leisure to be my Bible-woman. You shall teach sick and miserable people what you know about God and our Lord Jesus Christ."

"And them three—do they know?" inquired Mrs. Linnett.

"They know nothing," he said. "None of them can read, and the old man has only one idea in his head—how he can keep off the parish, and bury his children and himself in coffins of their own. Try them, Mrs. Linnett. Old Euclid goes to the market every morning, and Bess might still go with him, and bring back a basketful of fruit or vegetables for the shop fresh every day. Only promise me to try them."

"You were pretty sure o' that afore you came in, Mr. Dudley," she answered, with a quiet laugh. "I couldn't say 'no' to you, as befriended me when Thomas Linnett died away at sea. Where would my little pension ha' been but for you? There's the front room up-stairs, and a closet as'll do for the old man to sleep in, and Bess 'll sleep with me. I've kep' them for old shipmates o' Thomas Linnett's; but they'll find lodgings close by, and my heart goes after those two young lasses as have everything to learn. They'll fill up my spare time when trade's slack."

"How often is trade slack?" asked Mr. Dudley.

"Not as often as you'd think, sir," she said cheerfully. "Bein' so handy to the docks, there's always some old mate or other droppin' in as knew Thomas Linnett. They step in here, or, if it's fine, they sit on the counter, and we talk of old times on The Jemima; and most of 'em 'ud spend more money in the store than I let 'em. Some of 'em leave their money with me for safety, and I've six or seven sea-chests in my room to be took care of. So there's not so much slack time for me as you'd suppose."

Old Euclid visited the new lodgings proposed to him the next day; for there was no time to be lost. Some caution was necessary in making the move, so as to leave no clew by which Blackett could trace them. To make sure of perfect security, the old bedsteads once belonging to Mrs. Fell were privately disposed of, as well as the broken chair and empty boxes. The rest of their possessions were packed up, and stealthily conveyed down-stairs at four o'clock in the morning, Euclid's usual hour for being about; and a hand-truck, sent by John Dudley, quietly carried them off. Later in the morning, Victoria, pale and trembling, descended the familiar staircase for the last time, and, clinging to Bess, passed Blackett's open door. He scowled at them as they went by, and muttered an oath; but he did not rise up to follow them. When they had safely gained the corner of a street, a hack took them up, and set them down at Mrs. Linnett's door.

DEATH OF SAUL AND JONATHAN.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 23, 1 Sam. 31 : 1-13. Golden Text, Prov. 14 : 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Saul's Godless Reign—Gathering of the Enemy—From Prayer to Witchcraft—The Battle—Defeat of Israel—Saul Wounded and a Fugitive—His Death—Saul a Type—The Policy of Self—A Contrast—Self Changed but not Annihilated—Cannot Kill Itself—How to be Rid of it.

THE time of Saul's destruction was hastening on. For more than twenty years he had dragged on his reign, keeping up appearances, with all the external insignia of power, but knowing that he was rejected of God, and that his kingship was in reality a hollow sham. The Philistines grew bolder in their warfare, and gathered together their armies to fight with Israel. Saul's courage failed, "he was afraid; and his heart greatly trembled" (1 Sam. 28 : 5). And well it might, for when he inquired of the Lord, "the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." A man who cannot get an answer from God may well fear; if God is against him everything is against him, and how can he know that God is on his side, if he prays and prays and no answer comes? Saul had once chosen to be wrong with God rather than lose credit with the people, and now, when he would fain have had God on his side, it was too late. The poor unhappy man had recourse to sorcery, and sought out "a woman that hath a familiar spirit" (1 Sam. 28 : 7); although one of the acts of his reign had been to put away such out of the land. The spirit which she called up only confirmed Saul's worst fears; he had but a day to live, and then eternity! he had spent a lost life and he had to face

A LOST FOREVER!

The Philistines fought against Israel; there was no spirit in Saul to inspire his people to action; the Lord was not with him, and he knew it. No wonder then that "the men of Israel fled from before the Philistines, and fell down slain in Mount Gilboa." All resistance became useless; the word of God had gone forth, and Saul knew that his doom was hastening on. Had it been only for time, and he had no future to think of, it might have been bearable, but the spirit who was called up by the witch of Endor, had said, "To-morrow thou and thy sons shall be with me" (1 Sam. 28 : 19). Saul had the horrible anticipation of meeting God whom he had made his enemy, and now he and his sons too were going forth to certain death.

The first of them to die was David's beloved Jonathan; then Abinadab, then Melchishua. Part of the spirit's prediction was accomplished, but Saul still lived. The Philistines followed hard upon him, the pursuit was a hot one; God permitted it. "The battle went sore against Saul, and the archers hit him; and he was sore wounded." The end had come which long before had been determined by God, and the only question now was

HOW SHOULD SAUL DIE?

Saul said to his armor-bearer, "Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith; lest these uncircumcised come and thrust me through, and abuse me. But his armor-bearer would not; for he was sore afraid. Therefore Saul took a sword, and fell upon it." But self, of which Saul is a type, cannot kill self. In the very next chapter we read how a young man, an Amalekite, came to David, bringing with him the golden bracelet from the arm of Saul, and the crown which he had worn, with the tidings that Saul and Jonathan were slain. And in answer to David's question, "How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan his son be dead?" the young man answered, "As I happened by chance upon Mount Gilboa, behold, Saul leaned upon his spear (probably the weapon with which he had thrust himself through); and, lo, the chariots and horsemen followed hard after him. And when he looked behind him, he saw me, and called unto me. And I answered, Here am I. And he said unto me, Who art thou? And I answered him, I am an Amalekite. He said unto me again, Stand, I pray thee, upon me, and slay me: for anguish is come upon me [or my coat of mail hindereth me, see margin], because my life is yet whole in me. So I stood upon him, and slew him, because I was sure that he could not live after that he was fallen: and I took the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet that was on his arm, and have brought them hither unto my lord." Some suppose this story to have been an invention of the young man to curry favor with David; but Josephus relates that when Saul's armor-bearer would not slay him he called the Amalekite to do it.

SAUL IS A TYPE OF SELF,

the carnal mind which "is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be" (Rom. 8 : 7), and which Jesus calls on us to deny, "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself" (Matt. 16 : 24). Self, like Saul, is always head and shoulders taller than anybody else; and it is the principle which governs us in our natural life, and which takes in our being that place which God claims as His. It is self in a man which feels hurt and wounded when he does not get the credit he desires for that which he does; Christ in us gives all the credit to God. It is self in us which retaliates when we are unjustly treated; Christ in us when He is reviled, reviles not again. Self in us pities itself, thinks it has a right to be noticed and sympathized with, when in physical suffering, when it cannot get room in the car, when the car-conductor won't stop, when some one will open a window and make a draught, or shut a window and it can't breathe; self thinks it is to be pitied in all these circumstances, and loves to relate them, and excite and receive the compassion it craves. Christ in us sees the hand of God in all these things, believes they are all working together for our good, and praises God for a little test of faith or patience.

Self in us feels hurt if other people are being praised, and all their merits discussed; their work for God related, and their zeal and love admired; self thinks it loses too much ground, and seeks to turn the conversation to its own zeal and devotion or that of its father, mother, brother, sister, uncle, aunt, or twentieth cousin; so that the party spoken of shall feel that self has as much to boast of as he has. Christ in us is pained when anything is said about ourselves, or our work, knowing that the Lord Himself does it all; but rejoices to hear that of others spoken of, and is glad of the grace of God in them. Self is conscious of the impression it makes upon a person or people in entering a room, Christ in us makes us unconscious of ourselves. Self is always ready to exact its rights as regards honor, comfort, convenience, property, etc., and self has generally a somewhat magnified view of what its rights are. Christ in us has no rights but the will of God, and can therefore always and under all circumstances praise Him.

Saul is an apt type of this rival of God in our hearts and lives. Self may be changed as Saul was, may have "another heart," and be "turned into another man;"

BUT SELF IS STILL SELF

and not Christ. Self may be changed from sinful self and worldly self to converted self, but the same self-seeking, self-esteem, self-pity, self-justification is there, only on another ground. Self may become sanctified self, and the passion of life may be holiness; self may be the essence of consistency, and yet be self still and not Christ. There may be the greatest devotion, the greatest self-sacrifice on one hand, but it may be for the object of attaining holiness in ourselves, for the satisfaction of being, and being known as, holy people; but this is self still. Christ seeketh not His own, Christ seeks not His own glory, nor His own will, nor His own ideal, and speaks not His own words. Numbers of most earnest devoted Christians do not discern how much of self there is in their spirit, in their work, in their aspiration after, and in their experience of holiness.

As Saul was rejected, so is self; God cannot mix with self, and thus self must die, but die by its own hand it cannot. If we attempt to mortify self, the very attempt strengthens it, it is only as self is handed over to God and ignored that its death comes about. And this is no rapid process. Self, although condemned, may linger on, constantly manifesting itself in one form or other where it is least suspected. But of self? many say. Thank God, He has told us. Our old man is crucified with Him that the body of sin should be destroyed, and therefore, "Reckon yourselves dead indeed unto sin." Surely if dead to sin then dead to self also. This is just what the Lord says, "Let him deny himself." Paul did this when he said, "Not I live but Christ liveth in me." Saul attempted his own destruction, but could not accomplish it, and God made use of the Amalekite; but Saul had to will it. This is all we can do. Our faith and our will go very much together—if we will to be dead, we gladly take by faith that place of death which God has given us, and to every claim upon self we answer, "Not I live but Christ." To praise, blame, injury, persecution, "Not I live but Christ."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Another Massacre in Egypt was Reported on Monday last. A despatch from Cairo says: "A detachment of the Egyptian army was annihilated on Sunday, December 2d. The troops, chiefly negroes and Bashi-Bazouks, were marching with most of their Remingtons packed on camels, when, suddenly, over five thousand Bedouins, armed with spears and old muzzle loaders, attacked the detachment. The camels all stampeded. About six hundred troops managed to form a square—the blacks on three faces, the Bashi Bazouks on the fourth. The fight lasted only about twenty minutes, the Bedouins crying, 'Join us and kill the Christian dogs from Cairo!' All the Bashi Bazouks were killed. Many of the blacks threw up their hands, shouting, 'Aleikum salaam!' 'Peace be to you, true Mussulmans!' and then went over to the Arabs. The moral effect of this new victory of El Mahdi's followers is spreading like wildfire, his emissaries and dervishes appearing already in Upper Egypt and Assonan—the usual halting place for Cook's Nile tourists—and preaching holy war. The whole country is in a blaze. The rank and file of the Egyptian army at a favorable moment is likely to declare for the False Prophet, who is now regarded by the entire population as the true Messiah of Islam." The Sultan of Turkey offered to send an expedition to put down the revolt, but he was peremptorily informed by France that he would not be allowed to interfere.

An Effort to Save the Life of O'Donnell, the murderer of Carey, is to be made. His execution is fixed for December 17th. The friends of O'Donnell intend to present a memorial to the Home Secretary, asking that his sentence be commuted. The grounds on which the plea would be based are that it was not established in the trial that the murder of Carey was premeditated. A rumor that Mr. Lowell would use his influence on behalf of the condemned man was current last week, but is now contradicted. Mr. Lowell has received no instructions from the United States Government which, in his judgment, would justify him in interfering; it will be seen, therefore, that the hopes that commutation will be granted must be extremely feeble. The general feeling is that O'Donnell will suffer the penalty at the appointed time. The demeanor of O'Donnell in his prison continues to be exemplary. When informed of the date of his execution he received the intelligence with the most complete composure, and said to Father Fleming, who was with him, "I am quite ready to meet my fate. I have done my duty." As he cannot read, his prayers are read to him daily. The prevalent opinion in England is that worthless as Carey was, and infamous and despicable as he was, he was entitled to protection, and that O'Donnell must be executed as a warning to lawless people in Ireland and elsewhere.

Apprehensions of a War between France and China still prevail. A despatch pubished, on December 7th, says news has been received in Hong Kong from Tien-Tsin, the port of Pekin, that the government of China refuses to withdraw or modify its claims in regard to Tonquin, and that she prefers war to the surrender of the province to France. Large bodies of troops are continually passing Hong Kong en route to the Tonquin border. Premier Ferry still withholds his reply to the despatch of Marquess Tseng, in which the latter asked that Admiral Courbet be instructed to cease operations against Sontay and Bacninh. Marquess Tseng, becoming impatient, asked that an immediate response be given. The French Government expects to hear at any time from Admiral Courbet that he has captured Sontay, Bacninh and Honghoa as well. The attack on Bacninh will, it is believed, be followed by a declaration of war. Foreign residents in China are seriously alarmed, as the Chinese do not discriminate between Americans and Europeans, but regard all alike as infidels. They recently wrecked a Christian chapel in Canton. Dr. A. R. Platt, our Consular representative at a Chinese port, recently said to a reporter: "A mob is likely to massacre the whole foreign population at any moment, for the feeling is very bitter. The Chinese Government, of course, does all in its power to arrest such a movement, but it could hardly protect foreigners in such an event. The Chinese are terribly fanatical, and the slightest excitement may precipitate horrible atrocities. I hope that war will not be declared between China and France, for the almost certain result to the foreigners living in Chinese ports is fearful to contemplate." The Viceroy, however, assured Consul Seymour that he was able to protect the American missionaries, and was determined to do so.

Evidences of Disunion in the British Cabinet increase. The members of it are delivering speeches in different parts of the country, and the sentiments they utter are so antagonistic that it is difficult to understand how they can work together harmoniously. Nevertheless, they deny that any division in the Cabinet exists, Mr. Chamberlain himself calmly declaring that he is quite unaware of any; but Lord Salisbury, in an amusing speech at Watford; catalogued the contradictions between the public statements by members of the Cabinet on franchise and other questions, and predicted Lord Hartington's ultimate surrender. The Tories threaten to question the Ministers at the opening of the session as to whether they will accept or reject Mr. Chamberlain's declaration in favor of manhood suffrage. Such an interrogation may possibly lead to an open split in the Cabinet.

The Barbarities of Russian Prisons are being exposed in the European press. The Paris correspondent of the London Times has sent to his journal a letter, which was written in blood by a Nihilist confined in the Troubletskoi Bastion at St. Petersburg. It describes the harrowing treatment received by the prisoners, and says their food is often mouldy and sometimes putrid; that dysentery and scurvy are prevalent, and that the doctor is afraid to touch the patients. Few medicines are prescribed, and when ordered they are generally countermanded. The number of those who go mad in consequence of their sufferings is daily increasing. Madmen are strapped down and whipped with the knout by the keepers. Fierce yells resound throughout the night. Many prisoners have committed suicide. It is said that one woman was outraged and then poisoned, but no inquiries into the affair were instituted by the authorities. Rats are the worst enemies of the prisoners. A woman with a babe was obliged to be constantly on the watch and to fight night and day to prevent the rats from devouring her child. The use of combs and soap is forbidden, and the prisoners, especially the women, whose hair is allowed to grow, are literally devoured by vermin. The jailers are only kind to those having money. Prisoners who refuse to answer questions are tortured, and cases of violation of women are frequent. The writer especially appeals to the civilized world in behalf of the women in the prison, whose situation, he says, is far worse than that of the men. An effort is being made to induce the Czar to personally investigate the charges.

A Riotous Attack on the Gospel Meetings in Ireland occurred on December 2d. Major Whittle was conducting meetings in Wexford when a mob attacked the theatre in which the service was being held, and attempted to burn the building. The mob took full possession of the town, broke the windows of a Protestant church and those of nearly all the houses in the place occupied by Protestants. The dresses of ladies who attended service at the church and theatre were torn off, and the gentlemen accompanying them were stoned, and several of them injured severely. The mob paraded the streets for several hours, singing, "God save Ireland!" The mob made a bonfire of all the Bibles and hymn-books that could be found. One Protestant gentleman was attacked and carried down to the harbor, the intention of his assailants being to drown him; but some respectable Catholics interfered and saved him. Another Protestant was chased through the streets, and finally sought refuge at the police barracks, where he was told that the police were unable to protect him. He was seriously wounded. The police were confined to the barracks throughout the riot. It seems that even Americans cannot safely preach the Gospel in Ireland. The shipload of food and the immense sums of money sent from America to relieve Irish distress and to save the people from starvation count for nothing as claims on the people for gratitude. They now reject the spiritual bread of life that would be the salvation of the country.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey are Laboring with constantly increasing success in London. Tickets for admission are eagerly sought by non-churchgoers as well as by Christian people. The large hall is crowded at every service, and the numbers who go away, unable to gain admission, would fill another hall almost as large. Mr. Moody has been led by the Holy Spirit to dwell frequently and with emphasis on the heinousness and fearful consequences of the sin forbidden by the Seventh Commandment. He rightly believes that the prevalence of this sin justifies a departure from the reserve with which the subject has hitherto been dealt with in promiscuous assemblages. The secular papers mention the services with commendation. The London Graphic especially speaks in terms of warm eulogy of the evangelists and their work. After remarking on the evident earnestness and disinterestedness of Messrs. Moody and Sankey and their marvellous power over the congregations who listen to them, it says: "Their audiences consist largely of small tradesmen, clerks, shop-girls and servants. Good influences diffused through one class are sure to filter through unseen ways into the classes lower down. The clergy of various denominations in the north of London have been almost unanimous in the hearty assistance they have given to Messrs. Moody and Sankey in a work which the Bishop of Rochester lately commended in such warm terms to the support of Churchmen."

THE interest now manifested by European statesmen in the people and affairs of China is shared by Christians everywhere. But while those statesmen are speculating on the courage and warlike capacity of that vast empire and the probability of its opposing the French aggression on Tonquin by war, the Christian is chiefly concerned with the progress of missions in the benighted land. There is urgent need for prayer that war may be averted. China is naturally indisposed to submit tamely to seeing a province on her southern border, over which she exercises suzerainty, seized by the French, and while she clearly shrinks from a conflict, it may at any time be forced upon her. Should war unhappily ensue, the cause of missions will inevitably suffer. To the majority of the Chinese people all foreigners are alike. They are little likely to discriminate between the foreigner who ravages the country with fire and sword and the foreigner who carries the message of peace. Thus it is possible that the French aggression may retard missionary progress and even imperil the lives of the missionaries. At such a crisis the story of the life of a man who devoted his life to pioneer missionary work in China cannot fail to be read with interest.

William Chalmers Burns was a son of the Rev. W. H. Burns, D.D., and was born on April 1st, 1815, in the manse of Dun, in Angus, Scotland, of which parish his father was minister. Six years afterward the family removed to Kilsyth manse. He grew up a strong, sturdy youth, disinclined to intellectual pursuits, and with a strong desire to become a country farmer, but a circumstance occurred which changed at once the current of his thoughts, and opened a new and, as the event proved, a permanent change in his character. A maternal uncle, a lawyer in Aberdeen, who happened to be on a visit to Kilsyth, detected in William evidences of a vigorous intellect, which he believed would repay cultivation. He therefore invited him to spend a winter in Aberdeen, and take advantage of the training of the grammar school of the far-famed city, then at the very height of its fame. The invitation was accepted, and the lad, who was then thirteen years old, speedily felt the fascination of the place, and became ambitious of literary distinction.

From the school he creditably passed in 1829 to the University, standing in the fifth place among more than a hundred competitors for an open scholarship in Marischal College. He obtained honorable distinction in all his classes, and returned home in 1831, having completed, as he believed, his education and full preparation for the work of life. The profession he had chosen was that of

A LAWYER.

His father, who, seeing with pleasure his educational advancement, had earnestly desired his dedication to the Christian ministry, was disappointed, but feeling that in such a matter the boy should follow his inclinations he gave his reluctant consent, and a few months afterward he was settled with his uncle, Mr. Burns, a Writer to the Signet in Edinburgh.

God had, however, designed William for a far higher and nobler work than that which he had chosen for himself, though, as yet, he had no knowledge of Christ. About the middle of January, 1832, he suddenly and unexpectedly walked one evening into the dining-room at the manse, where his mother and sisters were sitting. His grave and earnest face and his manner, so different from his ordinarily careless, frivolous deportment, showed that he had news of importance to impart. In answer to their anxious queries he said that he had been brought from darkness into light and desired henceforth to consecrate his life to the service of the Saviour. He had walked all the way from Edinburgh, a distance of thirty-six miles, to obtain his parents' consent to his abandoning the legal profession in order to become

A PREACHER OF THE GOSPEL.

That consent was gladly given, and he reentered the University of Aberdeen to prepare himself for ministerial labor. He subsequently went to the University of Glasgow to complete his theological studies. There he formed the acquaintance of Norman McLeod, James Halley, and others, who afterward became famous, and with them he enjoyed intimate friendship.

In the University at this memorable period was

of which Mr. Burns was throughout his course an active and zealous member. This was a sort of focus and rallying-point of everything that was most earnest and Christian, both in the divinity hall and in the undergraduate classes. Here William Burns was ever peculiarly at home, and breathed an element which was to him more than any other congenial and inspiring. It was here, and especially while listening to the weighty and earnest words of a missionary—Dr. James Kalley—who was about to sail for China, that he first rose to the full idea of that entire and absolute consecration of his whole being and life to the service of Christ which in his subsequent ministry distinguished him. It was there that he formed his first definite purpose of devoting himself to the mission field.

HE WAS LICENSED TO PREACH

by the Presbytery of Glasgow on March 27th, 1839. He had already offered himself to the India Committee of the Church of Scotland Missionary Society, as ready to go to Hindostan. Just at this time he was invited by the Rev. Robert M. McCheyne, who was going as one of a deputation to visit the Holy Land, to take charge of his congregation at Dundee. This he accepted as a valuable opportunity of labor while he waited for entrance on the labor to which he had consecrated his life.

A REMARKABLE REVIVAL

took place in Scotland from 1839 to 1841, in which Mr. Burns was marvellously used by God for the conversion of souls. This work of grace began at Kilsyth, where he was preaching from Psalm 110 : 3. The preacher pleaded so earnestly with the people to close with God's offers of mercy, and the Spirit of the Lord became so mighty upon their souls as to carry all before it, like the rushing wind of Pentecost! The whole tone and spirit of the place seemed changed, and an air almost Sabbatic brooded over it, which strangers recognized.

From 1841 to 1844 Mr. Burns was engaged continuously in chiefly in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Edinburgh, and Dublin. He always sought the lowest and most depraved classes of the people, and though exposed at times to insult and danger from those whom he addressed, successfully carried the Gospel of Christ to multitudes. In 1844 he was led in the providence of God to visit Canada, where the same blessed results attended his Gospel-preaching, although he met with violent opposition from the Roman Catholic populace. It was on his return from Canada in 1846 that at length the longed-for call came to him to enter the field of missions to the heathen. He had been nine years in this preparatory training in the home-field when, at the age of thirty-one, he was sent forth as

A MISSIONARY TO CHINA.

The mission to China of the Presbyterian Church was commenced in 1847, and Mr. Burns was set apart as the first missionary of that Church, by the Synod at Sunderland in the month of April in the same year. Two years previously, the Church had resolved to undertake a mission to China. For two years they waited upon God in prayer, at the same time making diligent search for some one qualified for the work; but none appearing, the Committee had actually agreed to recommend the Synod in 1847 to abandon China, and turn to India instead, when, to the surprise and delight of the Committee, Mr. Burns presented himself at the Synod, and on the Convener asking how soon he could go out, he replied with characteristic readiness, "To-morrow." He was at once accepted, and on April 21st, 1847, solemnly ordained for the purpose.

He set sail from Portsmouth in the ship Mary Bannatyne, on June 9th. His farewell to his native land was full of tenderness and of brave hopefulness. After a voyage, not unattended with peril, of five months, the vessel anchored in Hong-Kong Bay at midnight on November 13th. At Hong-Kong Mr. Burns remained for twelve months, engaged in the study of the language, and at the same time ministering with much acceptance to a small congregation of English people. At the end of that time he had acquired such a knowledge of the language as to be able to make preaching excursions among the natives.

At length, in 1850, he made an attempt to establish himself at Canton, but suitable premises not being obtainable he to join Dr. Young, a member of his former congregation at Hong-Kong, but who had now commenced to work for Christ as a missionary of the Gospel. There he arrived on July 5th, 1851, rapidly acquired the new dialect, fitted up at his own expense a little chapel, and found good opportunities of preaching "the glad tidings" among the numerous towns and villages on the island of Amoy. As a proof of his earnest desire for the prosperity of the mission he sent home a whole year's salary as a contribution to the funds of the society; in regard to which it was remarked by the Convener, "Surely that field is ripe unto harvest when the reaper sends home his own wages to fetch out another laborer."

From this era his labors were truly abundant, though as yet little blessing could be seen. But three years later there were visible blossomings and buddings of the coming spiritual vintage; and at this very time Mr. Burns commenced a preaching tour which led to the awakening of many souls and the rapid extension of the native church.

TWO NATIVE CHRISTIANS

accompanied him on the occasion, whose history may be briefly noticed. Cheng-Choan had been a fortune-teller, and possessed great fluency of speech. He had been attracted by the preaching at the Mission-room in Amoy. On the first occasion he was driven away by a remark of the door-keeper, who, unhappily, was not a Christian. A year afterward the fortune-teller came again. An American missionary asked him, "Are you well? Is your heart at peace?" It was not; but as the result of listening to the Gospel, he yielded himself to Christ, and consecrated his rare powers of speaking to the service of God. The other man, Tiek-Choan, a schoolmaster, hearing of the new religion, could not understand why they should tell these Gospel stories to the people without asking for money. There is a class of story-tellers in China who narrate a story to the crowd, and then stop in the most thrilling part of it and ask for money. Tiek determined in his heart to discover the secret of this strange generosity. He, too, listened to the story of the Cross, and was won by the Saviour's love.

With these two men as his companions, Mr. Burns went as far as Pechuia, a country market-town about twenty miles distant. Here a house was hired for preaching, and the message of salvation was attentively listened to, and a considerable number turned to the Lord. Among those who, at this time, abandoned their idols to serve the living God was a young man named

Lam San, who early showed much decision. On the annual occasion of the birthday of he took the god and put it in a pot of water, boiling on the fire (see frontispiece). The idol having been thus defaced was afterward found by Lam's mother, and both parents beat their son unmercifully for his conduct. Some of the other converts going to comfort the son under this treatment, so reasoned with the parents, showing that if the idol could not take care of itself, it surely did not deserve their protection, that their sentiments underwent a sudden and entire change, and in a day or two afterward they, with their four sons, brought out all their idols and ancestral tablets, and publicly destroyed them in the view of the people.

In the year 1862 a considerable interest was manifested in the Gospel at a village called Khi-boey, about thirty miles distant from Pechuia. It appears that at the beginning of this year, a man named Chioh left the Mission-hospital at Amoy to return to his own village of Khi-boey. He had received Christ, and at once became a missionary to his fellow-villagers. Mr. Burns spent several days there the same summer, and was cheered to find a congregation gathered of about thirty Christian worshippers. As usual, they had to bear much opposition from their neighbors, and in the beginning of 1863, during the idolatrous festivities of the Chinese new year, broke out against the young Christians, owing to their refusal to contribute toward these heathen practices.

Not long afterward Chioh, in whose house the Christians had been in the habit of assembling, was driven from his home, and on his attempting to take refuge in the house of another Christian, the roof was broken by a mob, and Chioh prevented from entering. His widowed sister was then attacked, and her son threatened with death unless their demands for money were complied with; a sword was brandished over the lad's head while they required that he should cease to worship God. This he resolutely refused, declaring himself ready to die rather than renounce his faith. Chioh and another went down to Amoy for advice, and Mr. Burns at once returned with them to see what could be done. While he was attempting to pacify the enraged villagers, one of the converts was set upon by a number of men armed with bludgeons and pikes, and severely beaten, and would probably have been killed but for the intervention of Mr. Burns (see frontispiece).

An interesting incident was witnessed at Anhai about the same time. Two children were to be baptized. As the family lived at a distance of three miles from the chapel, the father was seen on the Sunday morning carrying his two infants slung from the ends of a long bamboo pole on his shoulders, as the Chinese commonly carry burdens; on the one end a basket was slung, in which a little boy sat, and on the other a cradle holding an infant of two months. The wife, who was not then even an inquirer, accompanied her husband to be present at the ceremony (see frontispiece).

We have space to mention only one more incident. In the year 1875, a missionary, named Campbell, had an almost miraculous escape from death at the village of Peh-tsui-khe. A fierce, lawless clan by the name of Gaw, on the plea that a Mission-room being built for the native Christians, interfered to prevent it, and the chief, named Gaw-a-chiu, sent a band of between thirty and forty armed men to attack and plunder the Christians. One midnight, Mr. Campbell was awakened by the smell of fire. He discovered that his bed-room was burning, and that the house was completely surrounded by armed with spears and knives, determined on taking his life. On attempting to escape he was driven back by the spears into the fire (as shown in the frontispiece). Escape seemed impossible, but committing himself to God, he made a last effort, and dashing out of the burning pile, he made his way through the dense smoke, which covered his retreat. Cold, exhausted, and almost naked, he remained concealed all night on the hill-side, and the next day under a burning sun made his way, with the help of a native preacher, to Ka-gi, where he was supplied with food and clothing. The shock and injuries sustained on that terrible occasion by Mr. Campbell were so serious as to require a furlough at home for rest and recovery.

As the pioneer of Protestant Christian missions in China, the name of Mr. Burns will ever be fragrant in the memory of the entire Church of Christ. His best monuments are to be found in sinners led to the source of life in Hong-Kong, Amoy, Swatow, Tat-hau-po, Pekin, and New-chwang, in Manchooria, besides at numerous missionary stations in remote and intervening villages and towns adjacent to those great centres.

LAST DAYS AT NEW-CHWANG.

In New-chwang Mr. Burns secured a dwelling-house and a Mission room, and with two native assistants carried on the work, finding the people very willing to listen to the Gospel message. There he remained, abundant in labors, from the end of August, 1867, to the day of his death, April 4th, 1868. We would gladly dwell on the events of his last days on earth, but our limits forbid. Let it be simply told that his death at the age of fifty-three was like a calm and radiant sunsetting. His last words were, "For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory."

The Presbyterian Church, under whose auspices Mr. Burns labored with such apostolic zeal, now employs about twenty-two European missionaries, and more than seventy native evangelists, besides students, missionary ladies, and a missionary teacher. J. E. Mathieson, Esq., Mildmay Park, London, is one of the honorary and devoted Secretaries.

THE CHINA INLAND MISSION,

the outcome of the sanctified genius and earnestness of the Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, has also a band of devoted and noble-hearted men and women laboring for Christ in China. Besides these, a small band of earnest agents represent the Baptist Missionary Society. In addition to these a noble band of American missionaries are laboring with success in the benighted land. The area of China Proper is 1,300,000 square miles; the population of China is more than 300,000,000, or about six times that of the whole of the United States. In other words, China contains about one-fourth of the entire population of the world. Surely the claims of a heathen land like this should lead many Christians to devote themselves personally to the work of winning its people to Christ, or to furnish liberal contributions for others to undertake the enterprise, through the Missionary Societies, in order that the Gospel of salvation may be communicated to the perishing millions of China.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Ghastly Discovery was Made on an Island off the Chinese coast by an American crew, one of whom has written an account to the newspapers. He states that the crew of the Hannah Rice while on their way to Mungur, on Shantar Bay, in Siberia, stopped at Big Shelter Island to enjoy some duck shooting. They crossed the island, and to their amazement discovered a vessel a cable's length from the beach. She had been hauled out on a high tide. A short distance from her, in a very exposed position, was a log cabin banked high on three sides with earth. "On approaching it," says the sailor, "we were startled to see lying a few yards from the door the detached bones of a man. Pushing open the door an overwhelming stench greeted us. We fell back precipitately, but finally mustering courage again advanced, and what a horrible sight met our gaze. Almost at the threshold lay a decomposed body. In a corner opposite the door lay another, and in a bunk built on the side was still another, making four in all. They were entirely unrecognizable, being nothing but masses of putrid flesh We found quite a store of salt beef, hard bread, tea, molasses, tobacco, etc.; also, two rifles, three old rusty sabres, and some ammunition." Near the bodies was a log-book containing entries showing that the men had died from scurvy alone and far from succor. It was a terrible death to die in that great solitude. That lonely island was a type of what this world would have been after sin entered it but for the infinite pity of God. When it was utterly lost and ruined He put forth His hand and provided a remedy (Isa. 59 : 16).

A Physician was Killed by his Remedy at North Salem, N. Y., last week. At an inquest held in that place on December 10th on the body of a well-known physician who had died suddenly the day before, the testimony showed that the doctor had for several weeks been suffering from a nervous attack, and that in order to steady his nerves he took a strong dose of morphine. When he had taken it he told his wife, and medical aid was summoned, but too late to save his life. Physicians tell us that the action of morphine is not to remove a disease or to cure, but to so act upon the brain and nerves as to render them less susceptible to pain and produce equanimity and restfulness. In this case the doctor had better have borne the pain. It is so in the case of people under suffering from conviction of sin. Worldly friends prescribe a treatment of theatres, dances, and other pleasures, and spiritual life is often quenched forever by their prescription (Mark 4 : 19).

A Perilous Escape of two Ladies from a Burning building in Baltimore, Md., on December 10th, is described in a despatch from that city. It was a high building, and when it was all in flames the spectators were horrified by seeing two ladies clinging to the iron balcony from the second-story window screaming for assistance. A gentleman ran and fetched two hair mattresses, which he placed under the windows below the balcony. The smoke poured from the window, and the young women let go their hold. One of them, instead of dropping, jumped, and struck her back against the stone steps and broke her spine, receiving injuries which will prove fatal. The other simply dropped upon the mattresses, and escaped severe injuries, though she was badly bruised and sprained. It is probable that the lady who jumped did not understand the instructions of her rescuers, or that she obeyed a natural impulse against simple passivity. It is such a natural impulse that frequently keeps sinners from rescue by Christ. They cannot understand that they must give up trying to save themselves, and, releasing their hold of all else, simply fall into His arms (Rom. 10 : 3, 9).

The Grip was Given and Taken at the Meeting of the Brooklyn Bridge Trustees last week. Colonel Paine, the inventor of the grip fixed beneath the cars on the bridge, presented to the trustees the right to use it and all its appliances forever. An endless steel cable is kept running to Brooklyn and back on the bridge by powerful engines, and the difficulty has been to devise a secure grip under the floor of the cars which would grasp the cable so firmly as to maintain its hold even when the cars were crowded. The success achieved by Colonel Paine was shown by the report of a Bridge official, who stated that Colonel Paine's grip had been applied and released 24,402 times, and had failed to take the car across only four times. The number of persons who had travelled in the cars so drawn across the bridge was 561,520. The motion of the cars excites surprise in the minds of country visitors, who from the river watch them go across, apparently without motive power; but they understand it when they see the strong cable and the powerful machinery underneath the car that is applied to it. So men go safely through this life and clear over the river of death who have a firm grasp on Jesus and trust to Him for safety (II Cor. 3 : 4, 5).

SET on a table the cutlery and the chased silverware of the palace ; for King Saul will give a state dinner to-day. A distinct place was kept at the table for his son-in-law, a celebrated warrior, David by name. The guests, jewelled and plumed, come in and take their places. When people are invited to a king's banquet they are very apt to go. But before the covers are lifted from the dishes Saul looks around, and he finds a vacant seat at the table. He says within himself, or perhaps audibly, "What does this mean? Where is my son-in-law? Where is David, the great warrior? I invited him, and expected him." What a scene is this, a vacant chair

AT A KING'S BANQUET!

The fact was that David, the warrior, had been seated for the last time at his father-in-law's table. On the previous day Jonathan had coaxed David to go and occupy that place at the table, saying to David in the words of my text, "Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty." The prediction was fulfilled. David was missed ; his seat was empty. That one vacant chair spoke louder than all the occupied chairs at the banquet.

In almost every house the articles of furniture take a living personality. That picture, in regard to which a stranger won't see anything remarkable either in its design or its execution, is more to you than all the pictures of the Louvre or Luxembourg. You remember who bought it, and who admired it. And that hymn-book, you remember who sang out of it ; and that cradle, you remember who rocked it ; and that Bible, you remember who read out of it ; and that bed, you remember who slept in it ; and that room, you remember who died in it. But there is nothing in all your house so eloquent and so mighty-voiced as the vacant chair. I suppose that before Saul and his guests got up from this great banquet there was a great clatter of wine-pitchers, but all that racket was drowned out by the voice that came up from the vacant chair at the table.

Millions gazed and wept at John Quincy Adams's vacant chair in the House of Representatives, and at Mr. Wilson's vacant chair in the Vice-Presidency, and at Henry Clay's vacant chair in the American Senate, and at Prince Albert's vacant chair in Windsor Castle, and at Thiers's vacant chair in the councils of the French nation. But all these chairs are unimportant to you as compared with the vacant chairs of your household. Have these chairs any lessons for us to learn? Are we any better men and women than when they first addressed us?

I. First, I point out to you

THE FATHER'S VACANT CHAIR.

Old men always like to sit in the same place and in the same chair. They somehow feel more at home ; and sometimes when you are in their place, and they come into the room, you jump up suddenly, and you say, "Here, father, here is your chair!" The probability is it is an arm-chair ; for he is not as strong as he once was, and he needs a little upholding. The hair is a little frosty, the gums a little depressed, for in his early days there was not much dentistry. Perhaps a cane, and old-fashioned apparel ; for although you may have suggested some improvement, father doesn't want any of your modern fashions. Grandfather never had much admiration for new-fangled notions.

I sat at the table of one of my parishioners of a former congregation, and the aged man was at the table, and his son was presiding at the table ; and the father somewhat abruptly addressed his son and said, "My son, don't now try to show off because the minister is here. Your father never liked any new customs or manners. I prefer the old way of doing things." And he never looked so happy as when, with his eyes closed, he sat in the arm-chair in the corner, contented, from his wrinkled brow to the tips of his slippers. The waves of all the past years of his life broke at the feet of his chair. Perhaps sometimes he was a little impatient, and sometimes he told the same story twice, but over how many blessed memories hover! I hope you don't crowd that old chair, and that it does not get very much in the way. Sometimes an old man gets very much in the way ; especially if he has been so unwise as to make over all his property to his children, with the understanding that they are to take care of him. I have seen in such cases the children crowd the old man's chair clear to the door, and then crowd it clear into the street, and then crowd it into the poor-house, until at last the old man fell out into his grave. But I hope that with you your father's chair was a sacred place, and the children used to climb up on the rungs of it for a good-night's kiss, and the longer he stayed the better you liked it. But that old chair hasn't been used now for some time. The furniture-dealer wouldn't give you fifty cents for it, but it has the influence of a throne in your domestic circle.

NAPOLEON'S CHAIR.

I saw in a French palace, and in the throne-room, a picture of the chair that Napoleon used to occupy. It is a beautiful chair ; but the most significant part of it was the letter N embroidered on the back of the chair with purple and gold. And your father's old chair sits in the throne-room of your heart, and your affections have embroidered on the back of that chair the letter F. Oh, that all the prayers offered upon that old chair had been answered, and that all the counsel uttered from that old chair had been listened to and practised. Speak out, old arm-chair.

History tells us of an old man whose three sons were victors in the Olympic games, and when these three sons came back with their garlands, and put them on the father's brow, the old man was so rejoiced at the victories of his three children that he fell dead in their arms. And you who are running the race of the Christian life which is set before you may win a victorious wreath of joy and Christian usefulness, and put it on your father's brow, or on the vacant chair, as a tribute to the memory of the departed. Speak out, old arm-chair. Oh, how true with reference to your father are the words of my text, "Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty."

II. I go a little farther on in your house, and I find

THE MOTHER'S CHAIR.

It is very apt to be a rocking-chair. She had so many cares and troubles to soothe that it must have had rockers. I remember it well—an old chair, and the rockers were almost worn out ; for I was the youngest, and the chair rocked the whole family. It made a creaking sound as it moved, but there was music in the sound of that chair ; it was just high enough to allow us children to put our heads into her lap. Ah, what a chair that was! It was different from the father's chair. It was entirely different. You ask me how. I cannot tell ; but we all felt it was different.

Perhaps there was about that chair more gentleness, more tenderness, more grief, when we had done wrong. When we were wayward father scolded, but mother cried. Oh, it was a very wakeful chair. In the sick days of childhood other chairs could not keep awake. That chair always kept awake—kept easily awake. That chair knew all the old lullabies, and all those wordless songs that mothers sing to their sick children, songs in which all pity and affection and sympathetic influences are combined. That old chair has stopped rocking for a good many years, and it may be set out in the loft or garret, but it has a queenly power to-day.

THE VOICE FROM THE CHAIR.

When at midnight you perhaps went into that grogshop to get the intoxicating draught, didn't you remember the voice that said, "My son, why go in here?" And, louder than the boisterous encore of the theatre, a voice saying, "My son, what do you here?" And, when you went into the house of sin, a voice saying, "What would your mother do if she knew you were here?" You were provoked at yourself, and you thought it was superstition and fanaticism as your head got hot with your own thoughts, and you went home and went to bed ; but no sooner had you touched the bed than a voice said, "What! a prayerless pillow?" Man, what's the matter? The fact is you are too near your mother's rocking-chair.

But pshaw! you say, there's nothing in that ; I am a great distance from where I was born. I am three thousand miles from the Scotch kirk whose bell was the first music I ever heard. Can't help it. You are too near your mother's rocking-chair. Oh, you say, there can't be anything in that ; that chair has been vacant a long while. I can't help that. It is all the mightier for that. It is powerful in its reminiscences, that mother's vacant chair. It whispers, it speaks, it weeps, it carols, it mourns, it prays, it warns, it thunders.

A WAYWARD SON.

A young man went off waywardly from the parental roof, and broke his mother's heart with grief. And while he was away from home the mother died. The telegraph brought the son, and he came into the room where her lifeless body lay. He looked upon her face, and he cried out, "Oh, mother, mother, what your life could not do your death shall accomplish. This moment I give my heart to God." And he kept his promise. Another victory for the vacant chair. With reference to your mother the words of my text were fulfilled, "Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty."

III. I go on a little further, and I come to

THE INVALID'S CHAIR.

What! how long have you been sick? Oh, I have been sick ten, twenty, thirty years. Is it possible? What a story of endurance! There are in many of the families of my congregation these invalid chairs. The occupants of them think they are doing no good in the world. But that invalid's chair is a mighty pulpit from which they have preached all these years—trust in God.

One day in last July, on an island just off from Sandusky, Ohio, I preached last summer, and there was a great throng of people there ; but the throng did not impress me so much as the spectacle of just one faith—the faith of an invalid who was wheeled in on her chair. I said to her afterward, "Madam, how long have you been prostrate?" (for she was lying flat in the chair). "Oh," she said, "I have been this way fifteen years." "I said, "Do you suffer very much?" "Oh, yes," she said, "I suffer very much ; I suffer all the time. Part of the time I was blind. I always suffer." "Well," I asked, "can you keep your courage up?" "Oh yes," she replied ; "I'm happy, I'm very happy indeed ;" and indeed she looked the happiest of any on the ground.

Oh, what a means of grace to the world are these invalid chairs! On that field of human suffering the grace of God gets its victory : Edward Payson, the invalid ; Richard Baxter, the invalid ; Robert Hall, the invalid ; and ten thousand of whom the world has never heard, but of whom all heaven is cognizant. The most conspicuous thing on earth for God's eye and the eye of the angels to rest on, is not a throne of earthly power, but it is an invalid's chair.

Oh, these men and women who are always suffering but never complaining, because they love the Lord Jesus, and are submissive to the will of the heavenly Father! These victims of spinal disease, and neuralgic torture, and rheumatic excruciation, they will hear the roll-call of the martyrs at last; and they will soon rise to the martyr's throne, and they will wave the martyr's palm.

But when one of these invalid chairs becomes vacant, how sad it is! No more bolstering up the weary head; no more changing from side to side to get an easy position; no more use of the bandage, and the cataplasm, and the prescription. That invalid chair may be folded up, or taken apart, or set away, it will never lose its queenly power. It will always preach the grand lesson of trust in God and cheerful submission. Suffering all ended now. With respect to that invalid, the words of my text have been fulfilled—"Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty."

IV. I pass on, and I find one more vacant chair. It is a high chair. It is

A CHILD'S CHAIR.

If that chair be occupied, I think it is the most potent chair in all the household. All the chairs wait on it; all the chairs are turned toward it. It means more than David's chair at Saul's banquet; at any rate it makes more racket. It is a strange house that can be dull with children in it.

How a child breaks up worldliness, and it keeps you young at sixty, seventy, eighty years of age. If you have no child yourself, adopt one. It will open heaven to your soul. It will pay its way. It is a crow in the morning, which will give the day a cheerful starting; and it is glee at night, which will give the day a cheerful close. Don't you like children? Then you had better stay out of heaven, for there are so many there they would make you crazy, hundreds of millions of them. Some of the disciples told the mothers to keep their children away from Christ. "You bother Him," they said; "you trouble the Master." Trouble Him, indeed! He has filled heaven with that kind of trouble.

A BABE IN CALIFORNIA.

A pioneer in California says that for the first year or two after his residence in Sierra Nevada County there was not a single child in all the reach of a hundred miles. But a Fourth of July occasion came, and the miners were gathered together, and they were celebrating the Fourth with oration, and poem, and a boisterous brass band. And while the brass band was playing an infant's voice was heard crying, and all the miners were startled, and the swarthy men began to think of their homes on the eastern coast, and of their wives and children far away, and their hearts were thrilled with home-sickness as they heard the babe cry. But the music went on, and the child cried louder and louder, and the brass band played louder and louder, to drown the infantile interruption, when a swarthy miner, the tears rolling down his face, got up and shook his fist, and said, "Stop that noisy band, and give the baby a chance!"

Oh, there is pathos in it, as well as good cheer in it; and there is no sound in nature that can rouse and melt and subdue the soul like a child's voice. But if, alas! the child's voice becomes hushed in the silence of death, the high chair then becomes a higher chair, and there is desolation all around you. I cannot speak from experience, thank God, but in three fourths of the homes of my congregation there is a vacant high chair. Sometimes you think you will never get over it. There is no one to put to bed at night; no one to ask strange questions about God and heaven. Oh, what's the use of that high chair? It is to call you higher. What a drawing upward it must be to have a child in heaven!

And then it ought to be such

against sin. When father is going away into sin he leaves the living children with their mother; but if the father is going away into sin, what is he going to do with his departed and glorified child, floating about him, and hovering over his every wayward step? Oh, speak out, vacant high chair, and say, "Father, come back from sin; mother, come back from worldliness. I am watching you; I am waiting for you." With respect to your child, the words of my text have been fulfilled—"Thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty."

My hearers, I have gathered up the voices of your departed friends this morning, and tried to intone them into one invitation upward. I set in array of your home and social circle; and I bid them cry out this morning, "Time is short, eternity is near. Take my Saviour. Be at peace with my God. Come up here where I am. We lived together on earth; come, let us live together in heaven." Oh, let us answer to that invitation, "We come. Keep a seat for us, as Saul kept a seat for David. But that seat shall not be empty."

V. I have been very earnest this morning, because I realize the fact that the day will come when will be empty. From this point, how often I have looked off into your friendly faces! I have seen a great many beautiful and thrilling sights, but never anything to equal what I have witnessed when in this church I have looked upon you when you rise for the doxology.

Seated in this chair, sometimes, I have greatly rejoiced at seeing the multitude coming to God. Then again I have trembled for fear that men would reject the Gospel. I wonder what this chair will testify when I have left it for the last time! Will it tell of a useful life, of an earnest ministry, of a pure Gospel? God grant it may. The most powerful sermon that is ever preached is by the vacant chair of the pastor, the Sabbath after he has been carried away from it.

And oh, when we are all through with this world, and we have shaken hands all around for the last time, and all our chairs in the home circle and in the outside world shall be vacant, may we all meet at the marriage supper of the Lamb, washed in His most precious blood, clothed in His spotless righteousness, and sanctified by His Holy Spirit. Thank God, there will be

NO VACANT CHAIRS IN HEAVEN!

WILL ROUND'S NARROW ESCAPE.

"WHERE is Round gone?" asked a saloon-keeper, whose bar-room was in a village on the Eastern coast, as he entered from the cellar with a bottle in his hand.

"I don't know," said one of the loungers; "he started up two minutes ago and staggered about, and then plunged out into the street. Gone home most likely, I guess. He seems to be pretty full to-day."

"He's always pretty well on," said the florid beer-seller. "I don't think he's worse than usual," and he went to the door and looked out, and then, apparently seeing the object of his search, went after him.

"What makes Joe so anxious about Round?" said one of the men. "Didn't pay for his beer, I guess."

Presently the beer-seller came back with a dollar bill in his hand and a look of satisfaction on his face.

"Did you find him, boss?"

"Yes I found him," said the man with an oath, "and I made him shell out, you bet. He wasn't too drunk to know he hadn't paid. He's going to walk across the bay to his home, he says. He'll have to step along if he don't want to be drowned, for the tide's coming in pretty fast."

"Guess it wouldn't be much loss to the world if he should be drowned," said one of the loungers. "Round's nothing but an idle loafer now, though I remember when he was as smart a man and as good a workman as any along the coast. He hasn't done a day's work now for above a year. He's too muddled now to know how to build a boat."

While Round's companions were thus commenting on his character he was stumbling along among the rocks alongshore. Not one of the men whom he associated with cared enough about him to follow him and help him along or dissuade him from taking the dangerous cross-cut to his home. How dizzy he felt! How his head ached! And his feet seemed to have escaped from his control, and when he lifted them up they fell heavily here and there like lifeless blocks of wood. How he wished he was at home that he might lie down and sleep. He knew he would be better after a sleep. Why should he not lie down on this soft sand among the rocks for a few minutes? It looked very inviting to the stupid, dazed man. He looked down, and resisted no longer. Ten minutes' sleep would put him all right, and he could then get home easily. He stretched his weary limbs on the sand, and settled his head against the rock with his soft felt hat between for a pillow.

Ten minutes, twenty minutes slipped away, and Round still slept the sleep of the drunken. The incoming tide surrounded the little hillock on which he lay, and was slowly, surely rising toward him. Another ten minutes, and two men in a little fishing boat saw a man up to his middle in water, wildly gesticulating and calling to them. They were humane men, and though time was precious they put their boat about and waited. Round waded as far as he could, and then stretched himself to swim. It was a terrible sight to see that struggle for life by the stupid, bewildered man. It would have ended fatally if they had not thrown him a rope and drawn him in.

That was Will Round's last debauch. He was saved that day from more than drowning. His narrow escape frightened him, and the two men who had rescued him took advantage of his scare to make him sign the pledge, which God enabled him to keep. He often declared that in that struggle to reach the boat he seemed to live years. He saw his home, his weeping wife and children; he saw the boat-builder's yard where he used to work, and the saloon where he obtained the poison that had placed his life in peril. The dashing waves and the boat he was struggling to reach appeared to vanish, and his fight with the waves was mechanical until he seized the rope and held on for dear life. Will afterward clung to teetotalism as he clung to that rope, and it saved him to his family and to society.

Evangelical Work in Belgium will Receive an impetus, it is hoped, from the appointment of three Swiss preachers to labor in that country. The Belgian Christian, describing the work now in progress, says: "Pastors, evangelists, Scripture-readers, and colporteurs are pursuing their work with zeal and with blessing in many parts of the field of labor. During the last five months 88,835 tracts, in addition to Bibles, portions, and religious books, have been distributed. Sunday evening meetings for the reading of the Bible are held in private houses. In some of these from twenty to fifty Roman Catholics have been present. The Bible is also read and listened to with respect and attention in workmen's lodgings. One of the readers says: 'I find no difficulty now in this work, and what is done is grand, but I wish I could see more conversions.' The seed sown will, doubtless, spring up and bear fruit."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Wonderful Change.—Mr. Miller Said at a recent meeting: "I will tell you an incident which will show the power of a prayerful Christian wife. The man was one of the worst cases I ever knew. He was completely under the power of drink, and continued so until his children had grown men and women. His wife prayed faithfully all these years. Their children became Christians, and joined their prayers to hers. Lately he was converted to Christ, and the transformation is something wonderful to behold."

A Scotch Magistrate's Last Sermon.—Mr. Arthur said: "The last night I was in this church it was for the purpose of relieving and comforting one who felt the premonitions of his last illness on him. Bailie Govan had served God long and faithfully. His employés looked to him as to a father, and he was a true and faithful friend. His last act in public was to deliver the message of God in this church from the words, 'As it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment' (Heb. 9 : 27). It was delivered faithfully and earnestly; he felt that his time was short, and he yearned over the souls of men with a great longing for their salvation. He went straight home from the meeting to his bed, from which he never rose again."

A Dying Woman's Great Gladness.—At a noon prayer-meeting in Glasgow lately, the Rev. John Stewart said: "A Christian woman was dying, rejoicing in the Lord. Now and then her heart was like to burst with gladness at the prospect of seeing Jesus, whom she dearly loved. One of her visitors was surprised at the evident joy of the departing believer, and asked, 'What is the cause of your gladness?' She answered, 'I have God's own promise in His own Book that I am going home.' 'Have you no other token?' 'Yes,' she said, 'I was glad when they said unto me, "Let us go into the house of the Lord." I am going there now to dwell forever in the Father's house in which there are many mansions.' 'They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever'" (Psalm 125 : 1).

A Man Cured of Self-Sufficiency.—The Rev. James Scott said: "I spoke to a gentleman the other day, and found him to be a man of great intelligence, but his mind was unable to grasp the idea of a personal Christ. He said, 'For twenty years I have been seeking salvation, and have not found it.' 'What prevents you doing so?' I inquired. He said, 'My difficulty is this—no one has ever personally indorsed Christ's promise to me.' 'I can do that,' I replied; 'I have found Him to be faithful to all that He has promised.' We conversed some time, and soon I learned that he had no Christ in his religion; his efforts had been directed to save himself, and do without Jesus altogether, but failure was the result. We have reason to believe that he is now resting solely on Christ as his Saviour."

An Eagle's Sudden Death.—Captain Hatfield said at one of the meetings: "Some years ago a man interested in the habits of our native birds was watching the flight of an eagle. It rose from its eyrie with a spring, and soared upward until it was a speck in the distance, far, far beyond the reach of man or man's power. The watcher was absorbed in admiration of the noble bird, with the strong, easy beat of its wings as it flew toward the sun. Suddenly, he saw it begin to come near the earth; looking a moment, he perceived it was falling as though a shot was in its heart. Soon it fell at his feet lifeless. Surprised, he examined the body, but at first he found nothing to account for its death; but on a closer scrutiny he was able to trace the path of a small insect which had clung to its feathers and bored its way right to the heart of this kingly bird, thus in a moment causing its death. Among men we often see a similar thing happen. One standing head and shoulder above his fellows, outwardly all is noble and good, until some hidden sin, indulged, finds its way to the heart and he falls to earth powerless for further earthly good. Examine yourselves, friends, lest some secret sin, doing the destroying work of hell, is eating its way to your vitals."

An Aged Soldier's Request.—Mr. Arthur said: "Sir Colin Campbell was reviewing a number of troops one day, when an old man stepped out of the crowd, and saluting him, said, 'General, do you know me?' 'Yes, my man, I saw you in a battle thirty years ago,' was the reply. Sir Colin put his hand into his pocket for money to give to the man, but the old soldier said, 'No, no, Sir Colin, I don't want your money, but I do want you to do something for me.' 'What is it?' 'My son is in the Inniskilling Dragoons which you are to review next week; call him out of the ranks, and tell him you knew his father.' This man was satisfied if a man in power noticed him and honored him before his son; but those who are faithful to Christ will be honored by God before the whole world."

Weaned from Whiskey Toddy.—Mr. Deware said: "Personal example is more powerful than any amount of mere talk. I became a total abstainer thirty-seven years ago, when I was a teacher in a factor's family. The first night I spent in the house the toddy was put on the table as usual. There were present the factor, the minister, the doctor, and myself, the teacher. On seeing the whiskey I asked myself, 'Is it right for me to join in these drinking habits; are they becoming in a Christian man?' I decided they were not, so I declined to take any toddy. Next night my tumbler was rather ostentatiously put aside, and I was subjected to a good deal of personal banter, especially from the ladies. What was the result? Why, one by one the party gave it up, till they were all teetotalers, and all this from the example of one youth."

An Afghan Hero Captured for God.—A Fine-looking man rose and said: "On the 16th of October, 1879, I was in a most dangerous position. It did not look at all possible that I could escape with my life. I was in a most fatal engagement during the Afghan war. The thought went through my mind, 'If I am shot, where shall I be?' Thank God, I was not shot, my life was spared; the serious impression wore off my mind, and I lived in sin as bad as ever. Yet my strange escape kept coming back to my memory over and over again. When I came home I learned that special prayers had been made for me on that day by my friends. This made me resolve, with God's help, to turn over a new leaf; so I went to a small evangelistic meeting, creeping in very much like a thief. For a week I endured great agony of mind; the mere turning over of the leaf gave me no comfort. One night I went to the tent, where a young man spoke to me about John 3 : 16, and said, 'Whosoever! d'ye believe that?' I looked into his earnest face, and felt constrained there and then to give myself to Christ. I went home a happy man, and have been rejoicing in my Saviour ever since."

An Old "Invincible" Society.—Professor Lindsay said: "Last Sabbath night there was in a corner of this church a poor fallen woman, and the Gospel for her was in the name Mary Magdalene. The Gospel for every one is in the names 'Matthew the publican' and 'Simon the Canaanite.' Matthew was a tax-gatherer, a renegade Jew, an outcast. Is it possible for a man to be socially lower than Matthew was? It is not. Simon was a Canaanite, which means that he belonged to the most strict sect of the Pharisees. This sect was divided into three: first, there were the common Pharisees; then, the zealots; then, the Canaanites. The last named was a secret society, and the meaning of their name is 'the dagger men.' They were the most religious, the most strict in observance of the law, and the most patriotic of all the Jewish nation, for each member was bound to assassinate every Roman official when he could do so with safety, and for this purpose always carried a peculiar dagger on their persons. The man who was hated and despised and the man who was almost worshipped were both disciples of Jesus. Is not the Gospel in these two names? It is to every one, however good or however bad they may be."

THE RESTORATION OF THE KINGDOM OF ISRAEL.

By Rev. T. J. Malyon, LL.B.

Prophecy in the Psalms—Commencement of the Kingdom—The Tune Hidden—The Manner Declared—The Teaching of the Vision of the Metal Image—The Kingdom of Triumph—Prophetic Testimony—Universal Empire—New Testament Confirmation—The Coming Universal King.

As the separation between the kingdoms of Israel and Judah did not take place till after the death of David, the son of Jesse; and as the condition of the children of Israel could not at that, or any time since elapsed, correspond with well-known passages in Ezekiel and Hosea,* it follows, as a necessary consequence, that either the former David must be raised from the dead, and actually sit again upon the throne of Israel, or some person typified by him must (if there be meaning in language or truth in prophecy) be yet expected to occupy that station in future. The general consent of Jewish and Christian interpretation admits that David is spoken of in the sacred Scriptures as a type of the Messiah; and that David himself speaks continually in the person of the Christ, rather than in his proper character, is a point now sufficiently ascertained, and additional illustration may be deemed superfluous.

Our Lord's last declaration to His disciples is decisive as to the prophetical and typical relation of the Book of Psalms, and their application to transactions manifestly subsequent to His incarnation and sufferings. "All things must be fulfilled which are written in the Law, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me" (Luke 24 : 44). The duty of a Christian inquirer is to follow the line and rule of interpretation adopted by the Saviour, when, "beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself (verse 27). The mode He pursued as to His suffering, is equally applicable to His triumphant kingdom; and the result of comparing Scripture with Scripture will be, that a kingdom is yet to come, in which Christ will sit on the throne of David as king of Israel; and that this can be neither the kingdom of God within us, nor the eternal throne of God in the highest heaven, is manifest from the consideration, that the literal David (His father according to the flesh) never could be supposed to set up the one, and never can be expected to sit upon the other.

With this preliminary remark, which, if correct, must never be lost sight of in the inquiry, we proceed to search the Scriptures, and to consider what grounds they afford to sanction the expectation of a kingdom of Israel yet to come, or, rather, to be restored in the person of the Messiah, as a descendant of David, according to the flesh.

At the first coming of the Saviour to establish His spiritual kingdom, the children of Israel, to whom He was sent, were preoccupied by the numerous and distinct declarations of prophecy concerning their final deliverance and emancipation on the establishment of the kingdom given by covenant to David, and at that time subjugated by the Romans. Nothing could, therefore, be more natural than the expectation expressed by the disciples of Emmaus: "We trusted that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel." Our Lord said nothing at the time to refute such an expectation as groundless, but upbraided the disciples for not observing and believing what the prophets had also spoken concerning the sufferings which were to precede;

* Ezekiel 27 : 22; Hosea 3 : 4, 5.

"Ought not Christ to have suffered these things?"

Afterward, when the question was distinctly put to Him, "Lord, wilt Thou, at this time, restore again the kingdom to Israel?" His answer cast no doubt on the expectation itself, but respected only the time of its accomplishment: "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power" (Acts 1 : 6, 7). "To everything there is a season and a time for every purpose under the heaven" (Eccl. 3 : 1), and the season was now arrived for a more complete establishment of the spiritual kingdom, which the disciples had before been commissioned to set up immediately, beginning at Jerusalem—a manifest proof that, neither in the question of the disciples nor in the answer of our Lord, was any reference had to the spiritual kingdom, for that had no fixed time of commencement; and the set time for its enlargement was come, and was already known.

It is worthy, however, of remark that, at a period when the knowledge of the time of another kingdom (that of Israel) was hidden,

THE MANNER OF ITS COMMENCEMENT

was specially declared: "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." "A cloud received Him out of their sight." The coming of Christ and the kingdom to come are manifestly coincident. When the kingdom of Israel was first established (Exod. 19 : 5, 6), the Lord said unto Moses, "Lo! I come unto thee in a thick cloud" (ver. 9). When John, "in the kingdom of patience," received a fuller revelation concerning the Son of Man coming in His kingdom of power, he says, concerning that, "Behold! He cometh with clouds" (Rev. 1 : 7). Our Lord testified the same to Caiaphas: "Ye shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Mark 14 : 62). This declaration, being made to a high priest, might refer to the same testimony in the prophecy of Daniel, by which it appears that the kingdom to be set up is the same with the kingdom of Israel. When representing the monarchies or kingdoms of this world is broken by the stone which becomes a mountain and filleth "the whole earth," the toes represent the ten or several sovereigns of the Roman empire: "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed" (Dan. 2 : 44); or, as explained in the same verse, "The kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms."

In the corresponding vision of the four beasts (chap. 7), the prophet is told, "These great beasts, which are four, are four kings (or monarchies) which shall arise out of the earth;" and, on the destruction of the last, "one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven," to whom there was given "dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve Him," which is afterward (verse 27) said to be "under the whole heaven," and, by consequence, over and upon the whole earth. And this kingdom is thrice (ver. 18, 22, and 27) said to be given also to the saints of the Most High.

Compare these expressions with the promise of Christ to His disciples: "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as My Father hath appointed unto Me." "In the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19 : 28). "Ye shall see Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God." "And they shall come from the east and the west, and from the north and the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God" (Luke 13 : 28).

THE KINGDOM OF TRIUMPH.

In order to elucidate the proposition that this triumphant state of the Church on earth is the kingdom of Israel promised to the Messiah as the seed of David, nothing is requisite but candidly and cautiously to examine the several passages, or the most prominent, in which mention is made of David's kingdom as the subject of promise and of prophecy; and a more legitimate conclusion can scarcely be drawn than this, that whatever received only a partial accomplishment in the person of the literal David, remains to be fulfilled in the person of his antitype, the Messiah; and that whatever was not fulfilled at the first, remains to be completed at the second coming of Christ.

The argument of the Apostle (Acts 2 : 29) concerning the resurrection of Christ, to show that David in spirit spoke of Christ, will apply with equal force to the kingdom as well as to the person of David; David's kingdom is passed away, but that of Christ when set up, is never to be removed. The kingdom in question is not to commence, as has been shown, till the second advent, or mission, of Christ, at the restitution of all things. (Acts 3 : 18–26.) Those things which God before had showed by the mouth of all His prophets, that Christ should suffer, He hath so fulfilled; and of those times (when He shall come to reign), when He will restore all things, and, above all, the kingdom of Israel, "God hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets. God promised to Abraham that in his seed, "which is Christ" (Gal. 3 : 16), all the families of the earth should be blessed. He promised to David, "I will set up thy Seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons; and I will establish His kingdom. He shall build Me an house; and I will establish His throne forever. I will be His Father, and He shall be My Son; and I will not take My mercy away from Him, as I took it away from Saul"—in whose person the Theocracy of Israel was first interrupted (II Sam. 7 : 12 and I Chron. 17). These passages compared with Psalm 89, Heb. 1, Rom. 1, and especially Acts 2 : 30, show that Christ and His kingdom, and not that of a literal David, was the great and ultimate scope of the promise.

TESTIMONY OF THE PROPHETS.

Accordingly, Isaiah testifies the same in his most distinct prophecy of the Prince of Peace. "Of the increase of His government there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon His kingdom, to order and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this" (Isaiah 9 : 7). So chap. 24 : 23—"The Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously." So chap. 32 : 1—"A king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment;" and chap. 1 : 26—"I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning; afterward thou shalt be called 'The city of righteousness.'" So Jeremiah 23 : 5, 6: "I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and execute judgment and justice in the earth." See also Jer. 33 : 14–16, proving the same position beyond all controversy.

Other passages might be adduced, but those have been selected which refer distinctly to the regal dispensation of the Son of Man, under circumstances not realized at His First Advent.

It remains briefly to advert to a few of the passages in the New Testament not already noticed, confirmatory of an expectation, recognized even by heathen writers, at the First Advent of Christ. "An old and firm opinion had prevailed over all the East, that it is written in the ancient books of the priests, that some one coming out of Judea should obtain

"THE EMPIRE OF THE WORLD."

(See Suetonius, Life of Vesp. chap. 4; Tacitus's History, book v., chap 13; and Josephus, book v., chap 13, sect. 4.) It originated, as is supposed, in the prophecy of Balaam, "A sceptre shall rise out of Israel;" "Out of Jacob shall come HE that shall have dominion;" and possibly the Agag and the Amalek of that chapter may have more reference to the Anti-Christian enemies, whose destruction is to precede the last kingdom of Israel, than is generally supposed. (Compare Num. 24 with Ezek. 38, Jer. 7 and Revelation 18 and 19.)

The first and most remarkable testimony is that of Gabriel to the Virgin: "The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of his father David; and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of His kingdom shall there be no end" (Luke 1 : 32, 33). And, to omit the citation at length of passages which must be familiar to every Christian reader, it may be remarked, that our Lord was born and died "King of the Jews;" that He was adored as such by the Gentiles in the manger, and reviled as such by Jews, on the cross. The chief priests and scribes could neither obtain from Pilate an alteration in his superscription, neither could they vary the terms on which the kingdom of Israel was to be maintained. "Let Christ, the King of Israel," said they among themselves, "descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe" (Mark 15 : 32); whereas God had sworn unto David, that, "He would raise up Christ to sit on His throne" (Acts 2 : 30). He was to ascend and to sit down on the throne of His Father, before He would give to His followers to sit on His throne, when all His foes should be made His footstool. To those who thought that "the kingdom of God would immediately appear," He had testified by a parable that He was "to go away to receive this kingdom, and to return to set it up (Luke 19 : 12); and thus the penitent on the cross asked a participation of His glory, when the crown should succeed. He had seen the superscription, and cried out, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest IN (not into) THY KINGDOM" (Luke 22 : 42).

The Jews, however, would not have "this man to reign over them," or this God to reign in them. They, like their forefathers, would be as the nations: "We have no king but Cæsar." And this is the language of many among them still; "but that which cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, We will be as the heathen;" "For in Mine holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord God, there shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land, serve Me" (Ezekiel 20 : 32–40).

THE COMING UNIVERSAL KING.

"Blessed is the king of Israel, that cometh in the name of our Lord;" "Blessed be the kingdom of our Father David" (John 12 : 13; Mark 11 : 10), was the proclamation when Christ entered Jerusalem. And then was one prophecy of Zechariah fulfilled (9 : 9); But another of the same prophet yet remains to be accomplished (Zech. 2 : 10–13): "When the Lord shall inherit Judah His portion, in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again." "These things understood not His disciples at the first" (John 12 : 16), neither do they seem to understand them now; for if our Lord had intended this inauguration of His kingdom, as the seed of David on the throne of His father according to the flesh, as its last and only manifestation, how could He teach His disciples that the kingdom of God would not be nigh at hand or commence till the "times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled." How could He teach us to pray "Thy kingdom come," if already and altogether established? He told His followers that "Jerusalem is the city of the Great King;" and when has it yet been, as it is to be, "a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down, not one of the stakes whereof shall ever be removed?" Never has this yet taken place; nor, to all appearance, will it, till the Theocracy of Israel be restored, and all its ancient forms of administration be concentrated in one, for the name of the city from that day shall be "The Lord is there;" "Jehovah is our Judge; Jehovah is our Lawgiver; Jehovah is our king" (Isaiah 33 : 20-22).

"Shout, O Israel; be glad and rejoice with all the heart, O daughter of Jerusalem. The Lord hath taken away thy judgments; He hath cast out thine enemy; THE KING OF ISRAEL, the Lord, is in the midst of thee; thou shalt not see evil any more" (Zeph. 3 : 14, 15).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Republican National Committee in Session in Washington, D. C., on December 12th, decided that the national convention for the nomination of the party candidates for President and Vice-President, shall be held in Chicago on June 3d, 1884. Senator Sabin, of Minnesota, succeeds the late Mr. Marshall Jewell as chairman. Mr. Frye's proposal to change the basis of representation in the convention was discussed, but it was decided to leave it to the decision of the convention. The committee's action in this matter, though not unexpected, causes considerable dissatisfaction in the North. The principle of the change advocated by Mr. Frye is, that the number of delegates any State shall be entitled to send to the convention, shall be determined by the number of Republican voters in that State. Under the present system it is determined by the number of votes the State has in the Electoral College. If the change had been made, the number of delegates from the twenty-three Northern States would have been nearly three times the number of those sent by the fifteen Southern States. The selection of Chicago as the meeting place is considered by politicians an indication that the strength of President Arthur in the committee is inferior to that of some other prominent candidates for the nomination.

An Important Measure Designed to Remedy some of the existing evils of bankruptcy has been introduced in the House by Mr. Adams of New York. It is a comprehensive scheme, and the bill covering it consists of 128 sections. The measure will need the close and careful study of business men, as it is proposed to make it of uniform application in all States, and it introduces some radical changes in the present law. Among the leading features of the bill is one section prohibiting creditors from voting for an assignee who is a relative of the bankrupt. Many other important changes are proposed by the bill, among which are the following: The composition section provides that not less than thirty cents on the dollar shall be paid to every creditor; otherwise the debtor is not entitled to a composition. Where security is given it must be approved of by the court, and any person proving a false or fictitious debt under this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than three times the amount so proved or by imprisonment of not more than two years, or both, thus making it a penal offence. The penal section has a new and very strict clause framed to check the practice of purchasing and selling "in contemplation" of bankruptcy. It provides that any person who purchases any goods or chattels which have been purchased on credit and which remain unpaid for, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years. It will be seen that the persons who framed the bill have noted some recent glaring frauds. There is urgent need for legislation on this subject, but until this measure can be examined in detail it is impossible to decide whether its provisions are just. There is need that the interests of the debtor should be protected as well as those of the creditor, but the most important of all requirements is that it should make fraud difficult and punishable.

The Senatorial Caucus of Republicans on December 13th decided to nominate General Anson G. McCook, of New York, for the vacant Secretaryship of the Senate. The decision was significant on account of the reasons given for opposition to Mr. Gorham. The opponents of Mr. Gorham took the ground that his attitude as a journalist in respect to the Garfield-Conkling differences and to the Star Route trials had been such as to create bitter enmities toward him, and that his nomination for the Secretaryship would have a tendency to revive party differences which were in process of healing. The policy of the newspaper which Mr. Gorham controls and its extreme utterances during the progress of the Star Route trials caused much astonishment at the time, and the action of the caucus shows that it did not escape the notice of the leaders of the Republican party.

The Question of the Vote on the Prohibitory amendment in Ohio, which was declared lost, is being reopened. The Cleveland Leader gives the following account of the investigation as far as it has gone at present: "Satisfactory progress is being made in the work of recounting the vote on the second amendment. The errors and discrepancies between the vote actually cast and that returned, thus far discovered, induce the belief that the amendment was fairly carried at the recent election. Acting upon this belief, the persons having the recount in charge will extend their investigations to every polling precinct in the State. It will be remembered that this prohibitory amendment only lacked about 37,500 votes to secure adoption. It is estimated that many more than this number of votes were polled additionally for the amendment and kept back in making the returns, either through unintentional errors, a misunderstanding of the instructions given by the Attorney-General, or by deliberate fraud."

The Destruction by Fire of Another Theatre in New York, the second this season, occurred on December 14th. Like the burning of the Windsor Theatre, the destruction of the Standard on Friday was accomplished in a marvellously short time. In less than half an hour the large building was a complete ruin. Providentially the fire broke out before the audience assembled; had it occurred an hour later it is probable that a large number of lives would have been sacrificed. It is stated that certain precautions, which might have saved the building, such as an iron screen to the stage, were not provided. Theatre-goers may wisely heed the warning conveyed by these conflagrations. Beside the moral danger incurred in attending theatrical performances there is a distinct physical risk. Three theatres have been burned in the city within a year, and in each case the audience was saved by only an hour. The catastrophe in Brooklyn seven years ago this month is, it appears, liable to be repeated in all its horror at any time, owing to the peculiar liability of theatres to fire.

The Work of Helping City Waifs was Described at a meeting of the Children's Aid Society held in New York on November 27th. It appears that sixty thousand homeless children have already been placed in homes in the rural districts, and that temporary assistance in clothing, feeding, and instructing three hundred thousand others, has been rendered by the society. It has now six lodging houses, twenty-one industrial schools, and fourteen night schools. Much of this work is done by means of small subscriptions from the public, but the larger part is the result of the private munificence of the trustees and ladies in this and other cities. Some of these support a night school; others supply hot dinners to some of the schools—a most needed charity; others pay for prizes in the lodging-houses for attendance or economy among the boys; others supply the fund for "starting boys in business;" others aid in the sewing classes of the schools, or the religious and secular instruction of the boys in the lodging-houses; others again supply Christmas or Thanksgiving dinners, and others pay the cost of finding homes for particular children. It is satisfactory to learn from the police statistics that there has been a marked decrease in the number of juvenile vagrants and criminals since the society has been at work. This report, taken in connection with the society's record of individual cases, may encourage other cities to organize similar institutions.

A Memorial to Congress on the Subject of the liquor traffic was adopted on December 7th at a conference held in New York under the auspices of the National Temperance Society. General Clinton B. Fisk offered a resolution that the conference ask Congress to provide for the appointment by the President of an impartial commission to investigate and report upon the liquor traffic, its relation to pauperism, disease, crime, taxation and the general public welfare, and also the results of license and prohibitory legislation in the different States. The resolution was passed unanimously. It was stated that the Senate had four times passed a bill providing for such a commission, but it had been in each case defeated in the House.

An Ex-Alderman of New York Furnished last week a practical evidence of the necessity of greater care being taken in the selection of men for positions of so great responsibility. A woman who was charged with keeping a disorderly house was arrested, and when bail was demanded, an ex-alderman offered himself as bondsman. The judge refused him, saying that it was "a farce to have keepers of disorderly houses arrested under such circumstances." The ex-alderman then said that he would give real estate bail, and the justice should take it." The justice answered that he would be obliged to take twenty-four hours to consider, as the case properly belonged to another justice. The ex-alderman then muttered, addressing the magistrate, "You won't always be there; a time will come when I will be as good as you are." The justice then told him that if he continued to use remarks of that nature he would have him locked up. The ex-alderman became exceedingly demonstrative, when the justice directed an officer to remove him from the court-room, and he was promptly ejected.

A Gift of $150,000 to Princeton College was announced by President McCosh at the meeting of the Board of Trustees on November 8th. Dr. McCosh said that Mrs. Robert L. Stuart, of New York, had given to the college $150,000 for the purpose of placing the Department of Philosophy on a working basis. This money was given in memory of her late husband and his brother, Mr. Alexander Stuart.

An Extraordinary Temperance Movement has been in progress during the past two weeks at Flemington, N. J. Two reformed drunkards commenced meetings on their own responsibility, and though unsupported by any temperance society, succeeded in reaching the most depraved inhabitants. The whole place has been aroused, and the nightly meetings have been attended by numbers so large that overflow meetings had to be held in various churches. A reform club of two hundred members has been organized to discover and prosecute violators of the excise laws.

On Sunday Last Mr. W. Forbes Preached in the morning at First Place Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn. In the afternoon he gave a Gospel temperance address to a large audience in Chickering Hall, New York, and in the evening he preached at Madison Square Garden. Mr. Forbes has done a great deal of speaking and preaching in the cause of Gospel temperance gratuitously since he has been in America. It has been suggested by some of his friends here that as much good has resulted from his labors, it would be an act of graceful appreciation to present him with a small testimonial. We believe this is now in progress. If any of our readers would like to contribute, they may forward the money to this office, and it will be handed to the treasurer of the fund, and acknowledged in these columns.

The Well-known Building in Boston, Mass., which for nineteen years has been the headquarters of Dr. Cullis's faith-healing work has been enlarged and renovated. It was reopened on December 10th. An adjoining house has been purchased and connected with the original building, and the whole fitted up for use at a cost of $32,500. It was stated in the course of the dedicatory services that the contributions received during the nineteen years during which the mission has been carried on amounted in the aggregate to $600,000, and the sums received day by day varied from one dollar to two thousand dollars.

The Christian Work among the Jews of New York, conducted by the Rev. Jacob Freshman, is making progress. The services held in Cooper Union are well attended every Sunday evening. During recent Sundays Israelites came out, publicly professing Christ, and were baptized. Last Sunday, December 16th, Mr. Freshman baptized an Israelite and his wife. A delightful time is anticipated with the Hebrew-Christian Sunday-schools at the Christmas festival, to be held December 27th, in the Seventh Street Methodist Episcopal Church.

A Saloon Keeper in Ohio has Issued a Curious notice to the public. It runs as follows: "To all whom it may concern—know ye that, by the payment of $225, I am permitted to sell intoxicating liquors at my saloon in this city. To the wife who has a drunkard for a husband, or a friend who is unfortunately dissipated, I say emphatically, give me notice in person of such case or cases in which you are interested and all such shall be excluded from my place. Let mothers, fathers, sisters and brothers do likewise, and their requests will be kindly regarded. I pay a heavy tax for the privilege of selling liquors, and I want it distinctly understood that I have no desire to sell to drunkards or minors, or to the poor or destitute." If the saloon-keeper also excluded from his place all who would be better without the liquor he might close his store without loss of business.

Twenty-Three Days Buried Under a Hay-stack. Some boys playing around a haystack near Lacrosse, Wis., on December 10th, noticed something strange about it, and removed a portion of the hay, when, to their astonishment, they found a living man in a horrible condition of emaciation. Help was secured, and the poor wretch was extricated. He was almost dead, and was barely able to speak in a whisper. He said his name was Christian Anderson, that he crawled under the haystack on the night of November 17th to keep warm, and that the stack caved in upon him. He struggled hard, but was unable to extricate himself. He cried out, but no one heard him. His story was not credited at first, but inquiries made in the vicinity showed that it was probable, and his emaciated condition confirmed it. The man states that the hay fell upon his hands and arms and feet, but left his head and body comparatively free. He suffered intensely from thirst and mental agony. He says that he could hear people passing during the first few days of his imprisonment, but could not make them hear. Later he was too exhausted to call out. The hospital doctors entertain hopes of his recovery. The man's misery must have been aggravated by the knowledge that help was frequently near, yet he could not avail himself of it. The man who puts his trust in God need never fear being so situated with regard to Him (Ps. 34 : 15, 17).

The Rev. E. Payson Hammond is Conducting services at Darby, Penn. In a letter recently received from him, he says: "We are having good meetings here. Numbers are finding Christ. The meetings are held in a most beautiful building, given to the Presbyterian Church in Darby by Mr. Baird, in commemoration of his father, the locomotive builder. I well remember the time when in 1835 he arose in one of the meetings I was conducting in Dr. Adams's church, in Broad Street, asking us to pray for him. The stand he then took may have been one of the causes that led to the building of this church for Christ."

An Heiress has been Found in a Kitchen in New York. Superintendent of Police Walling was asked recently to search for Magdalene Heintweimer, a Bavarian woman, whose aunt had died in the German town of Messing and had left to her a large sum of money. It was learned last week that the woman was living as a servant in Watts Street. She had been employed previously at Hartmann's Hotel, which was burned in connection with the Windsor Theatre. It is strange that the aunt, if she intended to make Magdalene her heiress, should have permitted her to continue in a menial occupation, instead of preparing her for the good fortune awaiting her. Christians are taught that they are heirs of God, but He gives them during their life earnests of their future possession, and they know that their occupations here are intended to fit them for its enjoyment (Rom. 8 : 17, 18).

A Millionaire's Unbidden Guest was Punished for his intrusion in New York last week. On December 12th Mr. William H. Vanderbilt gave a magnificent reception, for which two thousand invitations were issued. Early in the morning, when guests were arriving, a man dressed in very plain clothes slipped in the basement unobserved and catching up two chairs made his way up-stairs to the ball-room. He was arrested as a suspicious person by a detective, who ejected him from the mansion and lodged him in jail on suspicion of being there for a felonious purpose. His excuse for his act was that he wanted to see the floral decorations, but he declared that he never expected the sight would cost him so much trouble. He will probably recollect in future that at private entertainments it is not safe to appear without an invitation. To the great banquet of all ages—the marriage supper of the Lamb—the invitation is general. Only those will be excluded who have wilfully spurned the invitation (Luke 14 : 23, 24).

Capturing a Bride in Idaho is an Achievement described by a writer on Indian customs in a contemporary. This is the manner in which the courting is done: In the first place it must be borne in mind that the young squaws are more fleet of foot than the bucks. Now, when a buck fancies a squaw, he provides himself with a lariat, as he would if he intended to lasso an animal. When the squaw sees her admirer approaching she behaves after her fashion, in the manner of other young ladies. She runs, and the buck runs after her. If she does not wish to be caught, she quickens her pace and is soon beyond reach of the rope. If, on the contrary, she does not object, the noose slips easily over her head and the prize is won. After all, the essence of the courtship does not vary much from that of civilized society; it is only the manner that differs. When men plead as an excuse for falling into sin the power and temptation of Satan, it is often the case that they, like the squaws, are a willing prey. Satan never yet captured a victim who made use of all the means of escape God provides for the tempted (James 1 : 14).

FATHERS IN CHRIST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I write unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning." . . . "I have written unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning."—1 JOHN 2 : 13, 14.

An Important Subject—An Unchanging Conviction—The Destiny of Modern Thought—I. Who are the Fathers?—May be Young Men—Persons of Maturity—Of Stability and Strength—Men of Heart—Tender—II. The Prominent Characteristic of a Father—Knowledge Concentrated—Its Object Peculiar—Special—III. The Message to the Fathers—Love one Another—Not the World—Beware of Lust—Be Watchful—Prepare for the Coming of the Lord.

OBSERVE the difference in the two verses: John first says, "I write," and then, "I have written." When in two former discourses* I preached upon the beloved apostle's address to the young men and the children, I gave you as full an interpretation of this difference as I could command, and I need not now repeat it. Certain additional thoughts occur to me, which I will give you, that the matter may be still clearer. The apostle John says, "I write," and by and by, "I have written;" this shows, I think, the importance of his subject. If he has already written upon it, he must think it to be a very necessary and valuable truth if he writes upon it yet again. A man does not discourse repeatedly upon the same subject if he be a man full of matter, as this inspired writer was, unless he feels that it is of necessity that he return again and again to his subject till he has impressed it upon the minds of his audience. Nails which are important to a structure must be driven in with diligence. Foundation stones should be laid with scrupulous care; and truth, which is fundamental, should be repeated by the teacher till the disciple has learned it beyond all fear of ever forgetting it.

This form of speech also reveals the unchanging conviction of the writer, who, having written once, is glad to write the same things again. This shows a mind made up and decided, from which proceeds consistent testimony. In these fickle times certain of must feel unable to say of any one subject, "I write," and "I have written;" for before the ink is dry they have need to blot out what they have put upon paper, and to write an amended version of their religious ideas. Scarcely for a month at a stretch do these loose thinkers abide in one stay: they are such wandering stars that no chart could ever mark their position for three weeks together. They might say, "I write, but bless you, dear people, I do not know what I wrote six months ago. Very probably my former opinion is not now true, for all things are flowing on, and my head is swimming with the rest. I am a man of progress; forever learning, and never coming to the knowledge of the truth. Blot out what I wrote a year ago, and read with care what I write to-day."

To which we reply, Dear sir, we cannot take much notice of what you write now, because in all probability in another week or two you will retract it all, or improve it from off the face of the earth. Neither shall we pay much attention to you then, for you will probably be on the move as soon as ever you have said your say. We decline to learn what we shall have to unlearn. We will wait in our present knowledge until you have reached something certain for yourself. Perhaps in twenty years' time, when you have pitched your gypsy tent, it may be worth our while to hear where it is; but we do not commit ourselves even to that promise; for as the progress you are now making is into deeper darkness, you will probably end in seven-fold night.

I rejoice, dear friends, in the fixity of the Christian's faith; I know nothing of improvements and growths in the Gospel of the Lord

*"A Sermon to the Lord's Little Children," and to "Young Men in Christ," published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on April 12th and May 3d, 1883.

Jesus, which is summed up in these words, "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." I believe that God the Holy Ghost has given us in the Scriptures a perfect and entire revelation which is to be received by all Christians without addition or diminution. I do not believe that apostles, martyrs, confessors, and teachers have been living for these nineteen hundred years upon falsehoods; I prefer the faith of saints in glory to the day-dreams of those whipper-snappers who nowadays claim to lead us by their "thought." Our mind is that of David when he said, "I hate vain thoughts." If it be a question of thinking we can think as well as they can, and our thoughts about the modern theology are full of sorrowful contempt. Peradventure the doctrine is new, though even this we doubt; but if it be new it is not true, for truth must necessarily be as old as the everlasting hills.

We observe that the word "meditation" is now seldom used, and "thought" is the modern idol. Just so; we meditate on revealed truth; but this notion of thought sets aside truth, and sets up mere fancy. We refuse to be of this vagrant party of thinkers; we are of

of believers. We can say—What we have written, we still write; what we have preached, we still preach; for inasmuch as we have preached that which is revealed in Holy Scripture, to that truth we stand and shall stand, God hepling us If we live a thousand years, at the close of life we shall have nothing more nor less to say than the fixed, immutable, eternal truth of God. We hope to understand the truth better, but we shall never discover better truth.

"I write," and "I have written," also indicate the abiding need of men; they require the same teaching from time to time. I suppose that John alludes to his Gospel when he says, "I have written," and now, a little later, he writes his Epistle, and says "I write"—giving in each case the same teaching. Men's natures are still the same, men's spiritual conflicts and dangers are still the same, and hence the same truth is suitable, not only from day to day, but from century to century. There is but one and but one help in spiritual danger. The true teacher evermore comes to men with the same truth, because men continue to have the same dangers, necessities, sorrows, and hopes. The fathers who needed that John should write to them previously, still needed that he should write to them the self-same thing. Though they may have grown more fatherly, they have not outgrown apostolic teaching.

Many years ago, when some of us were mere boys, we listened to the Gospel of Jesus, and our hearts leaped as we embraced it; it was the life and joy of our spirit; and now to-day, after having advanced far in the divine life, if we hear one of those simple sermons that first brought us to Christ, concerning the precious blood of Jesus and child-like faith in Him, it suits us quite as well as in those early days. I have noticed with regard to well-grown Christian people, that when I have given a purely evangelical discourse, meant only for sinners, and not at all designed for the edifying and comforting of full-aged saints, they have sucked it in with as much delight as if they were themselves newly converted. After all, though you and I are not now fed upon milk, yet is still most refreshing. Though we can now digest the solid meat of the kingdom, yet the children's bread has lost none of its relish in our esteem. The elementary truths are still sweet to our hearts; ay, sweeter than ever they were.

Concerning the fathers, I am going to inquire three things this morning: First, who are they?—"You fathers." Secondly, what is their peculiar characteristic?—"Ye have known him that is from the beginning." And, thirdly, what is the message to them?—"I have written unto you, fathers." What is it that John has written to fathers in the Church of God?

I. WHO ARE THE FATHERS?

We usually associate that idea somewhat with age; but we must take care that we do not make a mistake here, because age in grace, albeit that it may run parallel with age in nature in many cases, does not always do so. In the Church of God there are children who are seventy years old. Yes, little children displaying all the infirmities of declining years. It is not a pleasant sight to see gray-headed babes, yet I must confess I have seen such, and I have even been glad that I could dare to go the length of hoping that they were babes in Christ. One would not like to say of a man of eighty that he had scarcely cut his wisdom-teeth, and yet there are such; scarcely out of the nurse's arms at sixty years of age, needing just as much care and comfort as sucklings at the breast.

On the other hand, there are fathers in the Church of God, wise, stable, instructed, who are comparatively young men. The Lord can cause His people to grow rapidly, and far outstrip their years. David as a lad was more of a father in God than Eli in his old age. Growth in grace is not a time growth. In eternal matters years count for little. The Lord gives subtlety to the simple, to the young men knowledge and discretion. Solomon was wise while yet young; in some respects wiser than when he was old. Some youths have been like Joseph, men with God before they were men among men.

Nevertheless, as a usual thing, it is to be expected that advancement in grace should be accompanied with advancement in years, and it is so often so that we are wont to call those who are fit to look after the souls of others "the elders of the Church," not necessarily because they are old men, but because they are instructed in the things of God.

THESE ARE THE FATHERS,

then, men who have aged in grace, have come to the full development of their spiritual manhood, and have been confirmed in that development by the test of time and trials. Believers when they have in the course of years shown themselves able both to labor and to suffer, are fitly ranked among fathers. Why do we call the early writers the fathers of the Church? Not, I think, because we owe more to their teaching than to those of a later period, but because they were the first men, the pioneers, the vanguard, and so the fathers of the Church. The first and earliest members of a church will become fathers in due time if they continue in the faith, grounded and settled; their years of persevering holiness entitle them to respect.

"Fathers," again, are persons of maturity, men who are not raw and green; not fresh recruits, unaccustomed to march or fight, but old legionaries who have used their swords on others, and are themselves scarred with wounds received in conflict. These men know what they know, for they have thought over the Gospel, studied it, considered it, and having so considered it have embraced it with full intensity of conviction. These are the who detect where insidious doubt is creeping in, where deadly error under the guise of truth is slily undermining the faith of the Church; to that end the Lord has instructed them and given them to have their senses exercised to discern between good and evil. Among them are men who have understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do. If you are such fathers, dear brethren, I rejoice in you; if you are not such as yet, aspire to this eminence, and pray the Lord that you may not be long before you arrive at the ripeness and sweetness which belong to mellow Christians who are prepared for the great ingathering.

"Fathers," again, are men of stability and strength. If burglars are planning to attack a house they care little about the children, and make small account of the boys; but if fatherly men are about, the thieves are not eager for an encounter. Even thus the arch-deceiver has hope of injuring the Church by deceiving the little children and the young men, but the stalwart men of God, who walk in the midst of the household, looked up to by everybody, are not so readily blown to and fro. As the Spartans pointed to their citizens as the real walls of Sparta, so do we point to these substantial men, as under God the brazen walls and bulwarks of the Church. Men who are well taught, confirmed, experienced, and trained by the Spirit of God are pillars in the house of our God.

But there is something more than this in

CHRISTIAN FATHERHOOD.

The fathers of the Church are men of heart, who naturally care for the souls of others. It is not for himself that he lives, but for that dear family which is gathered about him. He is not wholly comprised within his own personal self, for he lives in all the house; he lives especially in his children. Their suffering or their want would be his suffering and his want. His heart has grown larger than when he was a child or a young man; for now his heart beats in all that household, of which he is the life. It is a grand thing when Christian men and Christian women come to this, that they are not perpetually thinking of their own salvation, and of their own souls being fed under the ministry, but they care most of all for those who are weak and feeble in the Church.

Having this care upon him the father comes to be tender; he partakes somewhat of the tenderness of a mother, and thus is called a nursing father. A true father, such as fathers should be, has a tender love for all the little ones. He would not hurt them; nothing would be more painful to him than to grieve them; on the contrary, he studies to give them pleasure, and lays himself out for their good. It is a great blessing to the Church when the leading spirits are loving; not rough and uncouth, domineering or hectoring, but gentle and Christlike. Oh, my brothers, who take the lead, let us bear and forbear, and put up with a thousand trying things from our Master's children whom He has committed to our care. Let us make ourselves the servants of all.

Not yet have I quite reached the full meaning of a father; for the father is the author, under God, of the being of His children; and happy is a church that has many in it who are spiritual parents in Zion, through having brought sinners to Christ. Happy are the men by whose words, and acts, and spirit, and prayers, and tears, men have been begotten unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord. What an honor it is to be such a father! I hardly think we can put any one among the fathers until he has won some heart for Jesus.

Thus have I described the fathers. They are never very numerous—they are never so numerous as they ought to be. Paul saith, "Yet have ye not many fathers;" but wherever they are, they are the strength of the Church. I have seen in the army a number of veterans marching in front, an ornament and an honor to the whole company. Such men we have in the Church of God, and such we need; men that are not flattered by opposition, nor made to lose their heads by excitement. They believe in God, and if others doubt, they are not infected by their folly. They know; they are certain; they have put their feet down, and will not move from their persuasion. When the time comes for action, they are ready for it; and throw their whole weight so heartily into the war that every charge tells. God send us regiments more of these in this evil day and preserve to us such as we have!

II. Secondly. What is

in Christ? Read the text. "I write unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning." He repeats the expression without alteration. Observe here the concentration of their knowledge. Twice he says, "Ye have known him that is from the beginning." Now, a babe in grace knows twenty things; a young man in Christ knows ten things; but a father in Christ knows one thing, and that one thing he knows thoroughly. It is very natural for us at first to divide our little stream into many rivulets; but as we grow gray in grace we pour it all into one channel, and then it runs with a force efficient for our life-work. May it come to this with us all, "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." May all our knowledge be focused as with a burning-glass upon this one point. May the adorable person of Him that was from the beginning fill the entire horizon of our thought. Oh, to have one heart, one eye, for our one Lord; and for Him alone!

Note, next, the peculiarity of their knowledge as to its object: they know "him that was from the beginning." Do not the babes in Christ know the Lord Jesus? Yes, they do; but they do not know Him in His full character. They know Him as having forgiven their sins, and that is much, but it is not all. Yonder is the blessed Christ, and I, a poor sinner, look to Him just as He comes to me, and I am lightened, and become one of His little children. Yes, and as I grow and become a young man, I approach nearer to Jesus, and get another view of Him; for I overcome the Wicked One even as He did, and thus I stand side by side with Him in the conflict. But if I come to be a father I enter into fellowship with the great Father Himself; for it is union with God the Father that makes a man a father in God.

Believers see Christ in a fashion similar to their own. I scarcely need allude to that which I have often mentioned to you, that every man in the Old Testament who saw the Lord saw him in

A CHARACTER LIKE HIS OWN.

Abraham, the pilgrim, saw Christ as a pilgrim. Jacob, the struggler, saw the covenant angel wrestling with him through the night. Moses, the representative of a people tried as by fire and yet continuing, saw the Lord as a burning bush. Joshua, the valiant warrior, saw the captain of the Lord's host as a man with a sword drawn in his hand. The three holy children saw the Son of God in the burning, fiery furnace, even as they were themselves. When you become a father in Christ you see Christ from the Father's point of view; not as newly come to save, but as "from the beginning" the Saviour of men.

Yes, but I want to notice again, that this knowledge is in itself special: the knowledge itself is remarkable as well as the object of the knowledge. "Ye have known him." A dear servant of Christ on this platform the other evening sat beside me; he belonged to quite another part of the Church of Christ, but he said to me of such and such a person, "You know, dear brother, he is he is not merely a Christian, but he knows our Lord; you and I know what that means, do we not?" I could only look at him with a deep look of loving appreciation. Yes, we do know the Lord as a living, bright reality, a daily friend, councillor, and companion.

III. Thirdly, dear friends, what is

THE MESSAGE TO THE FATHERS?

I would indicate that message very briefly, by referring you to the context. John has been saying to you, dear fathers, and indeed to all of us who are in Christ, that we should love one another. If you are truly fathers you cannot help loving all the family; the fatherly instinct is love, and fathers in Christ should be brimful of it. Little ones should be induced by our loving spirit to come around us, feeling that if nobody else loves them we do, if nobody else cares for them we do. I have known a father in Christ to whom a convert would speak much more readily than he would to his own earthly father or mother. I suppose they see an invitation in the faces of these fathers. May you and I be just such persons, and may the Holy Spirit use us for the good of our fellows.

The next message immediately succeeds the text: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world." Oh, dear fathers, you must not love the world, for it passeth away, and this is specially true of you. If any Christian man might love the world, and I hope none will do so, certainly the fathers may not. You know so much of Christ that you may well despise the world; and you are so soon going home that you ought to set little store by these fleeting things. You have all the marks of what they call declining years—I call them ascending years: you will soon be gone from the world and its changing vanities, therefore do not set your love on earthly treasures. Hold wealth with a loose hand, be ready to depart, for depart you soon will. Before the morning watch you may be gone to your Father's house on high. "Love not the world."

Another duty of fathers is also mentioned here. While they are not to love the world they must take care that they do not fall victims to any of the lusts of this present evil world, such as the lust of the flesh.

CAN FATHERS EVER FALL

that way? Ah me; we have to speak very solemnly and admit that the most advanced saint still needs to be warned against the lust of the flesh, the indulgence of appetites which so readily lead men to sin. Then there is the lust of the eye. David fell into that when he repined because of the prosperity of the wicked, and was obliged to confess, "So foolish was I, and ignorant." He looked at the prosperous wicked till he began to fret himself about them. That lust of the eye, in desiring more for yourself and envying those that have more—never let it happen to a father. And the pride of life—that thirsting to be thought respectable, that emulation of others, that struggling after honor and such like—this must not be in a father. You are men, and must put away childish things.

The next exhortation to the fathers is that they should watch, for, says the apostle, "Ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists." Oh, valiant fathers, keep ye watch and ward. I marvel much that members of churches agree to the choice of ministers who are not sound in the faith, nay, who do not seem to have any faith at all. How comes this about? We used to have in our Baptist churches substantial men who would as soon have brooked Satan at their own table as an unsound preacher in the pulpit. There used to be a company in the north of Scotland called "The Men." Why, if heresy had been preached before them, they would have been as provoked as Janet Geddes when she threw her cutty stool at the head of the preacher. They would not have endured these modern heresies as the present effeminate generation is enduring them.

Let the new theologians have liberty to preach what they like on their own ground, but not in our pulpits. Alas! the leading members in many churches are Christians without backbones, molluscous, spongy; snails I would call them, only they have not the consistency of a snail's shell. They are ready to swallow any mortal thing if the preacher seems clever and eloquent. Cleverness and eloquence—away with them forever! If it is not the truth of God, the more cleverly and eloquently it is preached the more damnable it is. We must have the truth and nothing but the truth, and I charge the fathers in Christ all over England and America to see to this. Get ye to your watch-tower and guard the flock, lest the sheep be destroyed while they are asleep.

Lastly, it is the duty of the fathers to PREPARE FOR THE COMING OF THE LORD.

How beautifully it is put in the twenty-eighth verse, "Abide in Him; that, when He shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before Him at His coming." It is addressed to you all, for you are all little children, but it is specially incumbent upon those of you who are fathers. Arouse all your faculties! Watch for the coming of the Lord, and keep your loins well girded. Jesus may come to-day; this Sabbath may be the last Sabbath of this dispensation; yet He may not come for ten thousand years for aught I know; therefore weary not if you wait through a long night. Be sure that He delayeth His coming, for He will surely return at the day appointed. Only let us hold fast that which we have received, and while we are waiting for the midnight cry, He will come, and will not tarry; therefore go ye forth to meet Him.

"Hold the fort, for I am coming,
Jesus signals still:
Wave the answer back to heaven,
By thy grace we will."

SELIM HISHMEH,

The "Boy" who was with Mr. H. M. Stanley when he Found Dr. Livingstone at Ujiji.

SELIM HISHMEH, whose portrait we give on page 812, is an Arabian, of the tribe of Moab. He was born at Nazareth, Palestine, in 1859, and is therefore now twenty-four years old. When quite young his family removed to Jerusalem, and on Mount Zion there made their future home. Among the advantages of the change, his father, the chief of the tribe, was securing better education for his children. Selim was sent to Bishop Gobat's school, and the progress he made was rapid and thorough. He acted as a dragoman when he left the school, and among other travellers he guided through the country was Mr. H. M. Stanley, who was so pleased with the lad that he did not wish to part with him, so he engaged Selim to accompany him for a time, saying that he would take Selim to where he would get more education, which was very gratifying to the young Arab, although his departure was against the desire of his mother and other friends. This was in 1870. The travels of Mr. Stanley are too well known to require any narrating here. Suffice it to say that Selim accompanied him on his visits to Constantinople, Sebastopol, Odessa, the Caucasus, the Caspian Sea, Persia, India, and Central Africa.

He was with Stanley in his famous search for Livingstone, and rendered important service. When all but despairing of the object of their search, a company of Arabian merchants was met, and from them Selim got news of the whereabouts of Dr. Livingstone (as shown in the picture on page 812); so acting on that information Stanley's party after a few days' hard marching came to Ujiji and found the veteran traveller.

The following extracts from Mr. Stanley's book, "How I Found Livingstone," show the high opinion he formed of Selim and his sense of his obligations to his young dragoman:

"Speke's 'Faithful' has proved as cowardly as any of them. Selim, the Arab boy from Jerusalem, has proved brave and faithful."

Again: "The most important member of the expedition, next to myself, was Selim, the young Arab boy, a Christian from Jerusalem. He was educated by good Bishop Gobat, and if all the Arab boys of his school turn out as well as Selim, Bishop Gobat deserves the highest praise for his noble work. Without Selim I must have perished at Mjuto, without Selim I could not have so well obtained the friendship of the chief Arabs in the interior, neither could I have well communicated with them, for though I understood Arabic, I could not speak it. I employed this boy in January, 1870, since which time he has travelled with me through Southern Russia, the Caucasus, and Persia. In my service he was honest and faithful; he was without fear and without reproach; and I feel while recording these praises of him, that they are totally insufficient to convey my sense of the services he has rendered to me."

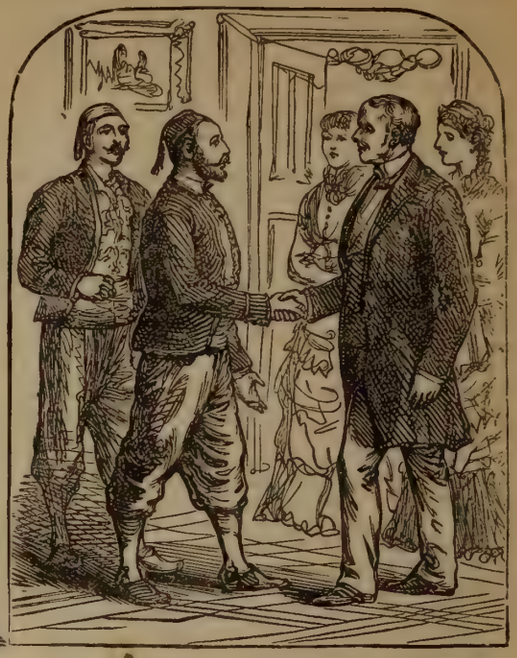
Selim Inquiring for Dr. Livingstone.

Selim Hishmeh, Mr. H. M. Stanley's Dragoman.



Selim Introduced to Dr. Livingstone's Family.

On the conclusion of the Livingstone expedition Selim returned to his own country and took service as dragoman under Messrs. T. Cook & Son, the famous firm who organize excursions in foreign lands, notably in Palestine. Subsequently Selim obtained employment in the United States Consulate. While so engaged he conducted a party of American travellers through the country, and entered into friendly relations with them. Out of that connection grew a painful misunderstanding. There are, of course, two sides to the story, and it is not easy to reconcile them. The actual outcome was that in 1880 Selim came to this country. He appears to have expected that he and five companions who had come over with him would have been educated and supported at the expense of his newly-made friends. They, on the other hand, allege that they engaged Selim and the other Arabs to travel through the country on exhibition. Selim complained that he "was stared at as if he were a monkey," and appears to have bitterly resented the experience to which he was subjected. However, the exhibition travelled around for nearly a year, the difficulties and unpleasantness increasing during the whole time.

Eventually, when they were at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, the crisis came, and Selim and the other Arabs separated from the exhibitors and started on their own account. They also procured from Palestine curiosities made of the wood cut from the olive trees and cedars of the Holy Land, and sold them at good prices. With the profits of the sale and of the exhibitions Selim defrayed the expenses of a passage home for four of his companions. Selim and his cousin were left, and they subsequently became acquainted with several wealthy members of the Society of Friends in Maine and Massachusetts, from whom they received much kindness. A subscription was opened on their behalf, and soon the two young men had the satisfaction of standing on the deck of the Devonia bound for Glasgow, on their way back to Palestine.

On their arrival in Glasgow Selim remembered that he had the address of two Scottish gentlemen to whom he had acted as guide in Palestine, and he determined to spend the few days of waiting for the Liverpool steamer in looking them up. Mr. Alexander Dobie and his son, the gentlemen referred to, received Selim's communication with delight. They went to call upon him, and invited the two young men to remain at their house as guests for a time. The invitation was gladly accepted, and Selim and his cousin enjoyed the hospitality of the Scottish home, and subsequently accompanied their hosts to their town house in Edinburgh.

The strangers attracted considerable attention in Edinburgh; and, among others, they were introduced to Mrs. Bruce, the in the discovery of whom Selim had taken so active a part. Both Mr. and Mrs. Bruce received the strangers with all gladness of heart. (The picture on this page illustrates the reception.) The friends to whom Selim was introduced were impressed with his intelligence and anxiety for knowledge. It was eventually proposed that if sufficient money could be raised Selim should be kept and educated. Through the liberality of friends the idea was carried out. He was sent to the University of Edinburgh for two years, with the view of his becoming a medical missionary for Central Africa. It was also deemed proper to send his cousin home to Palestine, which was done. The progress he has made in his medical studies up to the present time has been so encouraging that it has been urged by some of his devoted well-wishers, particularly some in America, that, as his education would necessarily be very incomplete without one or two additional years at the college, that an effort should be made to secure that object. It is not yet definitely settled; still, from what is known, it is probable that the necessary funds will be forthcoming, and Selim will yet go out to labor in the same field as the devoted man whom he assisted Stanley to find and relieve.

FRANK THIRLWELL'S DEFICIENT COURAGE.

Frank Thirlwell, on the death of his father, came into possession of a thriving plumber's business, which the old gentleman had established and developed until his son, who was also a clever workman, naturally considered himself on the high road to fortune. Frank, who had but recently attained his majority, entered upon his new responsibilities with no little ardor and confidence. An old friend of his father having one day expressed to the young man his hopes that the business would succeed under his management, Frank answered at once, "I intend to make it succeed. The success of every business depends on the amount of energy at the back of it; and whoever knows me knows that whenever I put my hand to a thing, failure is out of the question."

In the buoyancy of his youthful spirits it never occurred to Frank that it is not for him who puts on his armor to talk like him who takes it off. His success at school and his popularity in company, and, above all, his triumph in winning the heart of a beautiful young lady who had rejected more than one tempting offer, had ministered to his self-esteem. He had too much good sense to be a coxcomb, but too little experience and too sanguine a temperament accurately to measure the probabilities and contingencies on a just estimate of which all wise action depends. Consequently the judicious advice of his father's friends and the caution of his aged mother, who saw with dismay that Frank was less industrious and less frugal than during his father's lifetime, fell on deaf ears.

He had been in business on his own account about nine months when he received a visit from an old schoolfellow, who, like himself, was now carrying on the business of his late father. The two young men talked over their prospects and discussed the chances of becoming rich. Frank could scarcely have had a more dangerous friend, for young Fletcher was one of those ambitious schemers who despise the old methods of making a fortune. He believed in luck, and predicted that some day he would be a millionnaire. Frank listened, and the humdrum work of the plumber's shop grew more repulsive than ever. It seemed stupid to continue counting gains by hundreds when thousands were being made in a day. Frank knew he must work and save at the present rate until he was fifty before he could afford to retire from business; and then what would be left of life to enjoy?

"Now, here is a scheme I am engaged in," said Fletcher; "with a little more capital it would be a splendid success." He produced a packet of papers and drawings, and Frank Thirlwell listened to his explanations, and examined the papers. There seemed certainly to be money in it. Two thousand dollars stood to Frank's credit in his bank, which he regarded as capital for his business. But now might not a share in Fletcher's scheme be a better use for it? He would try. Frank wrote a cheque for the whole amount, which his friend carried away with him, congratulating Frank on his courage and sagacity.

The plumbing business after that seemed to be still more irksome than before. It was too slow. Frank Thirwell engaged a foreman who managed it, and relieved his mind of its petty details. Day-dreams now were the young man's chief occupation, and he saw himself in imagination surrounded with wealth and luxury, and his wife dressed fashionably and riding in her own carriage. After three months he thought he would see Fletcher and ascertain how matters were progressing.

"Glad to see you, old boy," said that worthy, as Frank met him on his way from the depot. "How is the plumbing business getting on? I thought of coming to have a talk with you. That affair you and I went into would be all the better for another two thousand dollars if you can put it in."

Frank's countenance fell. "What!" he said, "doesn't it pay?"

"It must eventually, but these things take time and money—especially money. If you can put in that two thousand I speak of, that will help it along. I would do it myself, but I am in so many things, and my business does not pay so well now as it used to do."

"No," said Frank, "I can spare no more. I have put into it every cent I have outside the business."

"I am sorry for that," Fletcher answered gloomily. "You aren't trustee for anybody, are you? It would be a good investment."

Now, as it happened, Frank had in his hands a considerable sum belonging to his mother which he could use if he chose in this way. He knew his mother would not consent, but he might easily use it without her knowledge and replace it when the scheme began to pay. The temptation was powerful, and it grew stronger as he entered his friend's house and saw the splendor in which he was living. All produced, as Fletcher said, by speculations like that. There was to be a ball that night; would not Frank stay for it?

"No," Frank said, he would go home and consider this matter of the trust money and write him. It cost a struggle, but Frank decided the next day that he would not put his mother's money in jeopardy.

That evening, sitting at his quiet tea-table, his wife read to him from the evening paper a glowing description of the entertainment "given last night at the mansion of our esteemed fellow-citizen, Mr. Fletcher." Frank sat listening gloomily. Had he acted wisely in staying his hand, he asked himself, as his wife read on. Perhaps he had been a fool and a coward. His thoughts were so busy that he scarcely noticed when the reading stopped. He was in doubt. That night he besought divine guidance, and then the glaring wickedness of the suggestion made itself clear to him. Early the next morning he wrote refusing to advance his mother's money.

"Very well," Fletcher replied, "go on plodding. You have not enough courage for speculation."

"If the courage needed is the courage to do wrong I have not, thank God," was Frank's devout comment. He discharged his foreman, settled down to work, and bade good-by to speculation.

Scarcely a month afterward Frank opened his newspaper as he rode down to business in the car, and was startled by the glaring headline: "Suicide of Mr. Fletcher." He read on with palpitating heart. The cause of the rash act was unknown. There were, however, disquieting rumors abroad. Defalcation was suspected; even forgery was hinted at. It all came out the following day. His friend, it appeared, had not lacked the quality he falsely called courage. Frank never recovered his two thousand dollars, but with a grateful heart he thanked God that he had been preserved from risking his mother's money. He is plodding on still, but he is cured of the haste to be rich, which always brings a snare.

An Old Question Repeated in a Strange Place. A gentleman in the civil service in Washington, D.C., sends us the following interesting communication: "It is a common sight in the corridors of the Capitol, at Washington, during the sessions of Congress, to see little knots of men in earnest conversation, devising means for political preferment, scheming for some gigantic draft upon the nation's treasury, or busy in lobbying through some pet bill; but on a recent day a man bearing the marks of a sinful life approached another, and with great earnestness asked, 'What shall I do to be saved?' The one appealed to replied that he could not tell him, but directed him to the committee room of a gentleman who has long been employed at the Capitol. This gentleman, not knowing the errand of the seeker after knowledge, informed him on his first request for some conversation, that he was too busy to admit of it. 'But,' persisted the earnest seeker, 'I'm lost, and I want to know what I must do to be saved.' The reply this time was, 'Come right in, and if necessary, I will give you all day,' and in that committee room, never before used for that purpose, this seeker after, not political favor or fortune, but his soul's salvation, was joyfully pointed to the living way by one who but two years since was himself lost in sin."

Political Teaching by Contrast was Resorted to in the late campaign in Iowa. At one of the large Amendment gatherings, where thousands of people congregated, a school-house on wheels was marched through the streets, drawn by four horses, and preceded by a brass band, and in the house a school-teacher was teaching the children. This was followed by a saloon fitted upon wheels, with a representation of a bar, drunken men, and a bar-keeper tempting boys to drink. These were accompanied by a banner, on which was inscribed, "Look on this picture, and then on that."

POVERTY'S PREY.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Disappointment.

MRS. LINNETT'S home was by no means a luxurious abode. The good old lady was too poor to afford elegant furniture, but she was scrupulously neat and clean, and such relics as she had retained from her more prosperous days, when her sailor-husband came home from his voyages with a well-filled pocketbook, had been carefully preserved. If the dead sailor could have looked in at his widow's rooms he would have been content. If there was no luxury there was comfort, and the old lady was well satisfied.

To Euclid and Victoria and Bess, the place seemed a little palace. The old garret with its poor ricketty bedstead, its empty boxes to serve as chairs, and its miserable surroundings, formed the only comparison for the new-comers. Here there was peace and quietness and cleanliness and comfort. As they entered they stood and looked around with delighted wonder.

One of the many old shipmates who had sailed in The Jemima with Thomas Linnett had papered the front room with a cheerful paper of red roses, and had festooned the window with strings of some foreign beans of a bright scarlet. The old egg-shaped grate, with high hobs, had been polished till it glittered in the firelight. Victoria's bed stood in the corner, ready made; and Euclid's was also ready in a little closet opening at the top of the narrow stairs. Over the chimney-piece hung an oval looking-glass, cracked across the middle, which had once belonged to some ship's cabin, and had found its way into Mrs. Linnett's possession; and on each side of it was a picture in a black frame. Victoria stood on the threshold of this sumptuous dwelling-place, gazing at it with wondering eyes, till she suddenly broke down into tears.

"Oh, it's too grand!" she sobbed. "We can never pay the rent here."

"To be sure you can," said Mrs. Linnett, soothing her tenderly. "And by and by you'll more than pay the rent, my dear, when you are strong enough to help me in the store; and that won't be long, my poor precious! There's the fresh breeze blowing off the river; that'll make you strong. And there's me to look after you, poor dear, that never knew what it is to have a mother! And father'll be as happy as a king to see you picking up your roses. And there's Bess—why, she'll be as good as a fortune to me, I know; she'll save my old legs and arms so. And it's a mile nigher to the market; and Bess shall go and buy me apples and oranges and green-grocery for the store; and we'll sell all the cresses as Mr. Euclid brings home of an evening. And you'll see if he doesn't more than pay the rent!"

It was a constant marvel to Euclid how Victoria grew stronger and brighter. Presently her pallid cheeks gained a faint tinge of red, and looked fuller and rounder; her eyes were happier, and her step less languid. She had no long, solitary hours now. Even when she was alone in her room, she could call Mrs. Linnett or Bess to her at any moment. Unknown to Euclid, Mr. Dudley provided more nourishing food for her than she had ever had in her life; and she was thriving upon it, as well as upon Mrs. Linnett's motherly care. It was like a new life to Victoria.

She learned to read and write with astonishing rapidity, leaving Bess far behind, and filling Euclid's old heart with fatherly pride in her. He could not keep himself from boasting of his daughter's learning to the saleswomen from whom he bought his cresses. His purchases in the market were of more importance now, as he had to keep the shop supplied with fresh fruit and vegetables; and, as Mrs. Linnett reckoned his services as worth a shilling a week to her, he felt well paid for his trouble. "The winter's woe was past" in very truth. He had lost his hoarded savings, and would never get them back; but what were they to Victoria's returning health, and the sight of her dear face as it greeted him evening after evening, looking out for him to come home, from Mrs. Linnett's door?

The only sorrow that sat by their fireside was the thought of David in prison. Bess was always talking of him, and of the day when he would be discharged. They counted the days till that would come. Old Euclid knew it as well as Bess; and Mr. Dudley pondered over the matter as much as they did. What was to be done with David when he came out of prison? How could the grievous wrong that had been done to him be set right? Could it ever be set right in this world?

"Davy'll be out next week," said Bess one evening, when they were all gathered round Mrs. Linnett's fire. Bess was sorely troubled She could never forsake David; that was impossible. But would Euclid and Victoria and Mrs. Linnett be willing to let her go away with him in his disgrace, and lose sight of her forevermore? She knew too well into what a gulf of misery and degradation she must fall with David, and a strange horror crept over her as she thought of it; but none the less was she ready to go away with him from this pleasant and sure shelter, rather than be guilty of deserting him in his dire distress. No, never could she forsake Davy!

"There's a verse you read last night, Mrs. Linnett," said old Euclid, "as has been runnin' in my head all day. I've not got the words quite true, I know, ma'am; but it's somethink like this: 'God doesn't want one o' these little young ones to be lost.' Somethink o' that sort it is."

"Ay, I know," answered Mrs. Linnett. "'It is not the will of your Father in heaven that one of these little ones should perish.' Jesus Christ said it: it's His words."

"It's like him," said Euclid, with a smile on his gray face. "It seems as if he was always a-sayin' somethink beautiful. And just afore that there was somethink about a sheep going astray, and gettin' lost on the mountains, and how he'd rejoice over it when it was found again; and then he says it's the same with the little ones; they sha'n't perish either. Poor Davy! he's gone astray; and he's no more than a young lamb as doesn't know the right way. What are we to do to set him right again, so as he shouldn't perish? If it's God's will, it must be done, I reckon."

"Where should Davy go but here?" asked Mrs. Linnett, in a hearty, cheery voice, which made the downcast heart of poor Bess leap for joy. "If you and he 'ud sleep together in my bed, Bess shall have the closet, and I'll sleep with Victoria. We shall shake down somehow. And Captain Upjohn, my old shipmate, says he'll take him with him to Sweden; and they'll be away six weeks or more, and his hair'll be grown, and he'll look all right when he gets back. Maybe he'll take to a seafaring life, and then he'll get on well, I know."

"Oh, if mother only knew!" cried Bess.

The day before David's release from jail was a great day in Mrs. Linnett's little house. Bess scrubbed every floor, and rubbed every article of furniture, as if they could not be bright enough to give David a welcome. All the while she was thinking of the many things she would have to tell him—of Roger's theft, and Blackett's hatred; and of Mr. Dudley and Mrs. Linnett, and this new happy home in which she found herself.

Mrs. Linnett, who dearly loved a little festival, was making wonderful preparations for a dinner far beyond a common meal to-morrow; and Victoria was helping her to wash currants and stone raisins for a pudding. None of them spoke much of the coming event, though their hearts were full of it; for, lying beneath the gladness, there ran a strong undercurrent of grief for the past, and of vague dread of the future.

"I wish Jesus Christ was only here now!" cried Bess, flinging her arms round Mrs. Linnett's neck, and sobbing on her shoulder. "I'd go and tell Him every word about Davy, and ask Him if He thought him bad enough to be sent to jail. If He was livin' anywhere in London, I'd crawl to Him on my hands and knees, if I couldn't walk, and tell Him all about it."

"He knows all about it, Bess," answered Mrs. Linnett, "and He'll make it up to him in some way. Only I wonder, I do wonder, as Christian folks can let it be! If the Queen 'ud only think about it, or the grand Lords and the Commons, as the newspapers speak about, they'd never let it be, I know. They'd find some other way to punish children. But we'll try and make Davy forget it when he comes home."

Mr. Dudley had found out the usual hour for the discharge of prisoners, and it was settled that Euclid and Bess should be waiting for him when the outer door of the jail was opened. Bess was awake long before it was time to get up in the morning. It was an April day, six full calendar months since David had left home in the autumn to go begging for his mother. Euclid had time to make his early round, and sell his cresses for the workingmen's breakfasts; and he had resolved to make the rest of the day a holiday.

Bess met him as he had just finished his sales, and then they turned their steps in the direction of the city prison. They were both happier and gayer than they had been since David went away; but Bess was especially glad. For, after all, in spite of the sorrow which cast so deep a shadow over her life, still David was coming back to her, and he was her own. He belonged to her, and she belonged to him. And Davy had always been so good to her.

They reached the prison a few minutes before the appointed hour, and paced up and down under its gloomy walls, blackened with dust and smoke, and towering high above the bent old man and half-grown girl who trod half-timidly under their shadow. The heavy gates were shut close, and no sound was to be heard beyond them. The porter's closely barred window and thick door seemed to forbid them to knock there and make any inquiry; but they had none to make.

They continued to pace to and fro patiently, with the meek and quiet patience of most of the honest and decent poor, not expecting any notice to be taken of them, or wishing to give any trouble. To and fro, to and fro, until the nearest church-clock, and the jail-clock within the walls, struck an hour behind the time, and still the prisoners were not set free. Again the weary footsteps trod beneath the gloomy shadows, and both Euclid and Bess fell into an almost unbroken and anxious silence. How was it that David was still kept in prison?

At length the door of the porter's lodge was opened, and a warder came out, having it instantly and jealously closed after him. Old Euclid summoned courage enough to address him.

"Sir," he said respectfully, "is there anything gone wrong inside the jail?"

"Why do you want to know?" inquired the warder, with a sharp glance at them both. "What are you hanging about here for?"

"We are waiting for this lassie's brother—David Fell," he answered; while Bess gazed up eagerly, yet timidly, into the warder's face. "His time's up to-day, and we've been looking out for him to take him home with us."

"Why, the prisoners have been gone this two hours," replied the warder. "We let them out an hour earlier than usual; for we've some great visitors coming to see the jail, and we wanted to get on with business. They didn't make any objections, not one of 'em, I can tell you. You make haste home, and you'll find him there."

But Euclid and Bess knew that they could not find David at Mrs. Linnett's, and they retraced their homeward path sadly and heavily. If he had thought of going to any home, it must be to that old, unhappy place, where his mother had died the day after his second conviction; and thither neither Euclid nor Bess dared go, for fear of Blackett. It was six weeks since they had secretly quitted it, and not a soul among their old neighbors knew where they had found a new roof to shelter them. They had trusted no one with that precious secret.

Yet Bess could not bear the thought of losing David. They must not lose him. Alas! they guessed too well where he must be. But how could they get to him, and let him know what friends and what a home were waiting to welcome him?

The feast was ready by the time they reached home; but none of them had a heart for it. Mrs. Linnett, however, took a cheerful view of the misfortune, and assured them Mr. Dudley would know how to find David without bringing any danger to Euclid. Mr. Dudley looked in during the evening, and, upon hearing the news, started off at once in search of David. He was almost as anxious to find the lad, and take him home, as Bess herself could have been.

David had been at the old house: that was quickly and easily learned. He had knocked at two doors, and been driven away from them both as a thief and a jail-bird; but nobody could tell where he had gone to. At last Mr. Dudley made an inquiry at Blackett's own door; but all he could learn was, that Blackett himself had left his old lodgings for good that very day, and had taken care not to leave his address.

For the second time—or, as the prison report registered it, for the third time—David Fell had been released from jail after three months. David knew the prison report was wrong. More than this, he had not felt that his first offence had deserved so severe a penalty. Now, when he had been defending his mother's good name, and seeking the restoration of her property, his whole boyish nature had risen rebelliously under a sense of cruel injustice.

He would do it again, he cried within himself; yes, if all the magistrates and policemen in the whole world were looking on. Why should his mother be cheated out of the only treasure she possessed? and how could he stand by, and hear her called what Mr. Quirk had called her? His mother was as good as any woman in London, and he was ready to fight anybody who gave her an ill name.

He was but a boy still. In many homes he would have been reckoned among the children, and his faults of temper would have been passed over, or leniently dealt with. He was in jail for a brave, rash action, which most men would have applauded in their own sons. Each time the trial that consigned him to an imprisonment of three months had not occupied more than five minutes. Police-courts are busy places, with a constant pressure of affairs to be despatched; and a police-magistrate has not time to investigate the statements of boys who, nine times out of ten, are telling a lie in order to escape punishment. David had been caught red-handed in his transgression of the law; and the law, framed as it had been against wrong-doers, swept him, in its resistless current, into jail.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 30. Golden Text, Isaiah 55 : 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Satan Inculcates Independence—Varieties of Conversion—Mistaken Notions of Sanctification—No Independence of God—A Striking Contrast—Selecting the Link of Communication—The People's Remedy—Human Thoughts Invariably Fail—Saul's Ideas—Why Saul was a Failure—A Better Representative—Led of God—The Saul and David in the Soul.

"FOR my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." Man was created to receive the impress of God; He made him receptive, made him finite, but capable of containing the infinite, the creature but capable of receiving the Creator. Throughout all time it has been the aim of our great enemy to reverse the right order of things, and to bring about in man the same kind of independence of God through which he himself fell. Many of God's children have to tell how their conversion took place quite differently from what they had imagined; they thought they would have had quite another experience, more like something which they had read in books, and God had to bring round their thoughts to His in order to save their souls. It is equally so about sanctification; so many imagine they are going to be filled with a conscious holiness, which will make everything like temptation an impossibility, and in which they will be filled with such joy that they cannot help speaking to all around them of the love of Jesus; and they will have such a blessed experience that nothing more can be desired, they will be independent of God altogether.

GOD'S THOUGHT IS QUITE ANOTHER.

Wherever He leads us, it is into the path of complete and ever-increasing dependence upon Him; to find Him our sanctification, and to possess nothing in ourselves at all, but all, yes all, in Him. Many sick ones who are seeking healing fall into the same mistake. They imagine that some Christians possess a kind of healing virtue, or that there is more efficacy in their prayers than in the prayers of others, that they can bring a greater force to bear on God than others can, and therefore they want to place their case in the hands of these Christians, not in the hands of God. There are others who really do look to God for healing, but they believe that the moment they are anointed for healing, or the moment they themselves pray about it, that moment all pain and disease ought to leave them, and they are totally disappointed if it is not so. God's thought is to heal the whole being—spirit, soul and body. He may see, as in the case of the paralytic, that the soul needs a touch of God yet more than the body, and He will not touch half the being and leave the other half untouched; He cannot work out our ideas, but calls us to enter into His.

In the history of Saul and David, we see most

the thoughts of God and the thoughts of man. When God saw that the priesthood was falling into declension, and that He needed a witness who could be a communicating link between Him and the people, God did not search out the most learned and talented among the sons of Eli; He did not lay the least stress on superiority of family, but sought out a little child, one who, at any rate, would not resist Him, who would be teachable, easily led, and who knew how to listen. This child was virtually the judge as well as the chosen prophet. By this child, God spoke to His people, and God in that boy had more influence in the land than had either priests or nobles. This was God's thought. When Samuel's mother sang, "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes," perhaps she little thought that her words were going to be fulfilled in the life of her own son.

But we shall remember, in the course of our lessons, how Samuel grew old, and his sons, whom he had made judges, "walked not in his ways;" then man began to plan a new remedy, and instead of trusting God to put the wrong things right, the people and wanted God to come into their thoughts, by making them a king. Sometimes God answers prayer in judgment. He let Samuel see His thoughts about this matter, and proclaim them to the people; but so set were they upon their own, that in face of any and every consideration they still clamored for a king. Oh, how sadly does the Lord speak of their obstinacy by the prophet Hosea, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help. I will be thy king: where is any other that may save thee in all thy cities? and thy judges of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes? I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath" (Hos. 13 : 9, 10, 11).

Saul was chosen, yes, and blessed; but man's thoughts can never answer in the long run. It was now the king himself who must be tried and proved, to see if he would run in God's thoughts or his own. God had declared war against Amalek; no life must be left in an Amalekite, nothing that breathed, whether man or beast, must be left alive; this was God's thought, and He called on Saul, as He had previously and successfully called on Samuel, to carry out His thought. But

SAUL HAD IDEAS OF HIS OWN.

"What a pity," perhaps he thought, "to slay Agag without getting a little extra glory out of a captive king. It would be so to my credit as a warrior to have this regal captive to show. And then the sheep and oxen; it is a heavy tax on the people to have so often to offer sacrifice; we will keep them for sacrifice, it cannot be wrong, because the motive is right." But, Saul, thou hast not taken into consideration that these are thy thoughts, not God's. Saul was a failure because he was seeking to improve upon God, instead of carrying out His purposes; he had forgotten himself, he had taken the position of God's representative in being made king, and now he was representing, not God, but himself and the people. It was enough: Saul must be rejected, he had failed through his independence of God.

Oh, how often in a day does the choice come to us between God's thoughts and ours! He wills that we should be careful for nothing; His thought is to be our caretaker. When we are anxious, perplexed, fidgety, unrestful, it is because we are not really depending upon God; we are undertaking something, calling for something; the weight of the responsibility rests upon us; we have not committed it out of our hands into His. As His children we are called to represent our loving Father, and we are acting as though He had no care for us, as though He left us to ourselves, and did not condescend to details; we act as though not only the hairs of our head were left unnumbered by God, but as though He had never heard about our business, our family cares, our church perplexities, etc., or as though He were indifferent about these things.

God needed another and a better representative in Israel, and He found His choice in a simple shepherd lad, the youngest of a family of eight, unknown by man, but simple enough to let himself be LED BY GOD.

And now a conflict began between the man after God's own heart, His representative, His willing, supple instrument, and the man after man's ideas, who was rejected of God. It was not David who opposed Saul, but Saul who could not endure the presence of David. Saul, rejected by God, became a cypher as to real power; and when things came to the push it was David, not Saul, through whom deliverance came. Let us apply this to our own hearts. There, also, Saul and David have played a part; Saul, the strength of our own nature, our talents, our experience, our strong will, our endurance, our power in whatsoever it manifests itself. David is Christ in us. God's choice, God's anointed. His holy anointing oil does not fall upon the flesh of man (Ex. 30 : 32); it is in Jesus our High Priest that we are His anointed ones. Now, how shall it be when we are in real danger? when Philistine hosts compass us, and some champion of darkness challenges to single combat, who shall fight him—Saul? In real conflict Saul is nowhere. Our strength may be great in logic, great in word, great in idea, but when it comes to the actual conquest of an evil temper, a besetting sin, an evil habit, either in ourselves, our children, or our servants, Saul is afraid, our own resources fail. It needs a David, it needs Christ Himself to come and do this real work. Saul could not so much as face Goliath—David conquered him. Oh, how many there are who labor with all the energy which they possess to conquer the evil within them! Sometimes they force themselves, sometimes try to force God by their earnestness in prayer, while all the time God's anointed is on the field only waiting His opportunity to do the whole work—waiting until the matter is put into His hands. There was one who understood David, Jonathan; and he was as his own soul. Jesus may be rejected in His fulness by the chief part of professing Christians, but there is a David-and-Jonathan friendship, a love which is "wonderful, passing the love of women" (II Sam. 1 : 26), a love which is "strong as death" (Can. 8 : 6).

David was again and again put to the proof whether he would take matters into his own hands, or simply trust God; he chose the latter. When, in two several instances, Saul was brought within his reach, he would not slay him; he had put his cause into the hands of God, and he would not interfere. Even when Abishai wanted to smite the sleeping Saul, David hindered him, though the responsibility would have been another's, he would not have lifted his own hand against the Lord's anointed; the opportunity seemed a most favorable one, but David had made it God's business, and he left it to Him. So it is when we know Christ in us; then there is no falling back upon natural resources, it is just a simple reckoning upon God Himself, and not upon either persons or circumstances; then we seek to carry out only His thoughts as He reveals them unto us, thus disowning and disregarding "our thoughts."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Proposed Visit of the German Crown Prince to the Pope is causing much speculation in Europe. It is generally regarded as a concession to the head of the Romish Church on the part of the German Government, and as a sign that the Emperor and Prince Bismarck are about to withdraw from the contest with the Pope on the question of the appointment of Roman Catholic bishops in Germany. A difficulty of court etiquette has also arisen out of the contemplated visit. The Pope would desire to show his appreciation of the courtesy of the Prince by returning his visit, but as the Prince will stay at the palace of the Quirinal during his visit to Rome, the Pope objects to go there. It is the residence of the King of Italy, whom the Pope considers his enemy.

The Expedition against El Mahdi Despatched by the Khédive of Egypt appears to be utterly inadequate for the purpose. It is commanded by Baker Pasha (Colonel Valentine Baker, formerly of the English army), and consists of little over six thousand men, a large proportion of whom are pressed into the service, and have no courage nor fighting capacity. Telegrams from Egypt say that the officers of the expedition enter upon the campaign with the gloomiest forebodings, and that Baker himself protested against being sent on so hopeless a business. Meanwhile Turkey announces herself ready to despatch an army into the Soudan of ten thousand regular troops. An unconfirmed rumor was current on Monday that the Khédive and his cabinet had decided on resigning unless England undertook the subjugation of El Mahdi or permitted Turkey to come to the rescue. The English commissioner in Egypt has informed the Egyptian Government that England will interfere only to secure the maintenance of order in Egypt proper. Sir Evelyn Wood, who commands the British forces in Egypt, has informed his government that no force can successfully attack El Mahdi which is not accompanied by mountain guns and apparatus for boring for water on its way. Such an expedition, he estimates, would cost one hundred million dollars.

The Programme of El Mahdi is one of Universal dominion. Statements to that effect have been made by travellers in Egypt, and they are now confirmed by the correspondent of the New York Herald, who says: "The question between the False Prophet and his enemies is not a mere question of disputed territory. If the whole of the Soudan, the whole of Egypt, or even the whole of Africa were surrendered to him to-day he would only be more aggressive than ever. He aspires to nothing less than the universal allegiance of Islam, and the condition of his existence is that he shall go forth conquering and to conquer. His object is to insert himself like a wedge between Egypt and her outlying provinces, and his mere presence in Egypt proper would so arouse the latent fanaticism of the entire population that the soldiers who reluctantly make up Sir Evelyn Wood's Egyptian 'army' and Baker Pasha's 'gendarmerie' and their English officers would be very lucky indeed to escape the fate of Hicks and his companions in arms. The False Prophet has not by any means yet pronounced his final word, and this new wave of Moslem fanaticism will scarcely fail to make itself felt, not only in Egypt, but in Tripoli, Tunis and Algeria, and cause uneasiness in Turkey and Central Asia and redoubled vigilance in British India."

A Warning to American Missionaries in Egypt has been promulgated. It appears that the Copts have conceived a bitter hostility toward them, and a popular outbreak is apprehended. Great excitement prevails among both Mussulmans and Christians, and the Governor of Siout has sent warning to the Egyptian Government of the threatened danger. The following list of missionaries in Egypt is published by the daily papers. They are all sent out by the Board of Foreign Missions of the United Presbyterian Church, whose headquarters are in Philadelphia. The names of these missionaries are: Rev. John Hogg, D.D., Rev. J. R. Alexander, Rev. John Giffen, Mrs. M. E. Giffen, and Misses M. J. McKown and E. E. Newlin. The other missionaries from the same organization in Egypt are as follows: At Cairo, Rev. Gulian Lansing, D.D., Rev. Andrew Watson, D.D., and Misses Eliza F. Johnston, Maggie A. Smith, A. Y. Thompson, and H. M. Conner. At Alexandria, Rev. S. C. Ewing and Miss Mary A. Frazier. At Mamsoorah, Rev. A. M. Nichol and Miss Isabella Strong. At Fayoum, Rev. William Harvey. There is a mission training college at Siout, which is attended by over two hundred students, mostly Egyptians, who are educated for missionary work among their native tribes. There is also a training school for young Egyptian girls.

The Annamites have Killed the King France set over them. A despatch from Hue, the capital of Annam, dated December 6th, states that the king had been poisoned, and that the people had declared war against France. It appears that guerilla warfare has been going on ever since the French troops entered Annam, but the people who fought against the invader had to contend, not only against the French, but against their own king, who regarded them as rebels against his government. A despatch to the New York Times says: "At Paris the diplomatic status as between Premier Ferry and the Marquis Tseng remains unchanged. The French Government has received advices via Saigon, which announce that a general rising of Annamites is threatened for the purpose of invading Cochin-China. Admiral Courbet is in need of reinforcements, and asks for six thousand men; otherwise he says he must abandon the attack on Bac-Ninh, in order to give needed assistance to Hue. Orders have been sent to Cherbourg to despatch five gun-boats, and to Toulon to despatch six gun-boats. Eight other gun-boats, to be of such make that they may be taken to pieces, and of the smallest draught that leave the Loire, are designed to penetrate the Bac-Ninh Canals."

Mr. Alfred Tennyson, the Poet Laureate of England, is to be made a peer with the title of Baron Tennyson-D'Eyncourt of Aldworth. Mr. Tennyson is a very popular poet in England, and the English people are pleased that his merits should be recognized by royalty, but they ridicule this particular form of recognition. A prominent journal observes: "That Tennyson should receive the personal recognition and admiration of his countrymen would be proper, but to make him, his son, and his son's son a legislator is a proceeding as exquisite in absurdity as to create the peer hereditary poet."

Mr. Parnell has been Presented with the sum of $190,000 by his admirers at a banquet in his honor in Dublin on December 11th. This large sum is a practical proof of a gratifying kind that there is not so much poverty in Ireland as was supposed. Mr. Parnell made a speech in accepting the gift, in which he denounced the present administration in Great Britain, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the present and former Secretary of Ireland. He concluded by saying: "Although our present progress is slow, we are adding to the impetus which was given to the national cause in the days of the great League movement. We must be patient if we wish to win. Coercion cannot last forever. It is certain that it rests with Irishmen to determine at the next general election whether a liberal or tory government shall rule England. This is a great force—that if we cannot rule ourselves we can cause England to be ruled as we choose. We are determined that this generation shall not pass away until it has bequeathed to those who come after us the great right of national independence and prosperity." The London Times, commenting editorially on the speech, said: "There was never a more uncompromising defiance flung in the face of the English nation or government than when Mr. Parnell in his speech in the Rotunda at Dublin, on Tuesday evening, declared war upon constitutional principles and the connection between England and Ireland. It is impossible for the public men of England to regard this renewal of Irish warfare with indifference or contempt. The situation is serious, and will tax the ability of English statesmen to the utmost." The general impression of the whole world is, however, that the situation long ago had passed the point indicated by the Times.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Meetings in London are being marked by many signs of deepened intensity and popular interest. Many workers have distributed the tickets for the various meetings among the poor of the adjacent districts. The interest thus shown has in general been highly appreciated, and the result is seen in crowded audiences, which are unmistakably composed largely of the working class element. The choir consists of some two hundred voices. The attendances have been continually on the increase. Nearly five thousand people have filled every inch of sitting and standing room available. The Bible-readings held in the afternoon have been less numerously attended, and the majority of the audiences have largely consisted of ladies, but attendances of three thousand persons have not been infrequent. Mr. Moody has, as usual, conducted both of the daily meetings throughout the mission, repeating several of his addresses and readings to his fresh hearers. The large audiences are deeply impressed. Mr. Sankey and the choir sing numerous hymns before Mr. Moody delivers his address, most of those present joining very heartily in the refrains. In response to the customary requests toward the close of the addresses, that those who are willing to decide for Christ at once would rise to their feet, large numbers stand up. The inquiry meetings were subsequently attended by one half the audiences, and with these Mr. Moody and the staff of stewards and workers engaged in personal conversation. A novel feature in connection with the mission is a children's service held on Saturday afternoons.

The China Inland Mission.—The Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, addressing a meeting in Edinburgh recently, stated that the China Inland Mission, which was started by himself thirty-five years ago, has now one hundred and twenty missionaries, who have preached throughout the whole of the forty provinces of the empire. In response to his appeal some months ago for seventy additional missionaries, up to that time he had procured thirty-five.

THE portrait which appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week is that of Mr. Richard T. Booth, the accomplished American temperance orator, who three years ago crossed the Atlantic to engage in temperance work in Great Britain, and whose labors there have been remarkably successful. He was born at Ithaca, N. Y., in 1844. His parents were poor, and at the early age of ten years he was sent to work in a cotton factory. At the outbreak of the war he entered the army and served in the 111th Regiment, New York Volunteers. He was engaged early in the war, and was taken prisoner. After his exchange he rejoined the army and was in the battles of the Wilderness and Gettysburg. At the close of the war he settled in Moravia, N. Y.

On January 1st, 1867, Mr. Booth married Mary J. Durling, of Seneca Falls, N. Y. She was a Christian, and had been reared in a Christian home. Shortly after marriage the young couple commenced business in Seneca Falls, and there Mr. Booth first came under the alluring influence of

THE "SOCIAL GLASS."

Up to this time he had been, if not a pledged, at least a practical, abstainer, and had no appetite for the drink. In two and a half years the habit acquired such a mastery over him, that it had to be satisfied at any cost, and his wife and children were brought to want. Of this period Mr Booth himself says:

"At last I could no longer endure the scorpion-like stings of outraged conscience, and in my remorse I resolved to END MY MISERABLE EXISTENCE.

One day when hovering on the very brink of the fatal precipice, I met in the street a young gentleman of the town, who had many a time been my boon companion, and who was the possessor of great wealth. With a kind heart and an open hand he proffered me assistance, which enabled me to remove to Moravia. There, through the devoted care of my wife and mother, I regained health and strength. After my recovery I went to Ithaca, the home of my childhood, and started forth in life afresh with high hopes and good prospects. Prosperity and friends returned. But in an evil hour I partook of a glass of lager beer. The appetite returned and reasserted its power, and again I found myself on the downward way.

THE GREAT CRISIS OF HIS LIFE.

"At last there came the great crisis of my life. One morning about four o'clock, after a night's carousal, I found my way to my miserable home. As I approached, I observed that the lamp was burning low, and there was no face watching for me as usual at the window. I thought that for once my patient wife, quite worn out, had retired to rest, having given up all hope of my return. As I ascended the steps I looked through the little window at the door, and there I saw her kneeling in the centre of the room.

"I entered the house, and feeling was so dormant within me that I tried to pass her prostrate form on my way to the sleeping apartment. In an agony of despair she seized me and pulled me down on my knees by her side. She threw her arms about my neck, and this was her prayer, 'My God, have mercy on me and save him!' Smitten with anguish, out of the depths of my helplessness, I repeated her petition, 'My God, have mercy on my wife, and save me!' God mercifully heard and answered our united cry. From that moment to this not a single drop of the accursed, soul-destroying liquor has passed my lips. I rose from my knees a saved and sobered man. Soon afterward I signed the temperance pledge, and set up the family altar in my now happy home; a new and blessed era in my life's history was begun."

AN ADVOCATE OF THE BLUE RIBBON.

Within a few days of his conversion Mr. Booth appeared on the platform as an advocate of the Blue Ribbon temperance movement. His first temperance address was delivered in Ithaca, and from that time to the present he has been assiduously and successfully engaged in fighting the foe that had so often conquered him in bygone days.

Early in the autumn of 1877 he was joined in his public work by Mr. J. Reed Smith, who, like himself, was a reformed man. They clasped hands, and engaged in the Blue Ribbon enterprise with enthusiasm, and with a deep-set determination born of experience. The young men went to the New England States, and began a mission in the city of Holyoke, Mass. They held successful meetings, and a large number of persons formerly addicted to drunkenness signed the pledge and donned the blue ribbon. A week was devoted to East Hampton, and then a campaign was begun in Greenfield, Conn. Here they were also favored with wonderful success.

Among the places next visited, and in which similar beneficent results were experienced, were North Adams, Fitchburg, Clinton, West Brookfield, and Turner's Falls, closing their first year's New England campaign at the town of West Somerville.

The second year of the joint labors of the temperance evangelists was inaugurated by a camp-meeting at Sterling Junction, Mass. It commenced on September 3d, 1878, and lasted for eight days. There were present many of the leading workers and speakers on this theme in America. Colonel Luther Caldwell, Colonel Pearce, Miss Frances E. Willard, and other well-known friends of the cause, delivered addresses. The railroad companies provided extra trains for the throngs that daily visited the camping-ground. From this time onward to the month of October, 1879, Messrs. Booth and Reed visited about fifty different centres of population in the New England States, and, among others, the city of New Bedford, Mass., where much good was done.

After two years of service, Mr. Smith and Mr. Booth parted at the close of their work in the city of Keene, N. H., where they met with great success. Mr. Smith returned to the practice of his profession as a stenographer, while his companion in labor continues to devote himself to the work of Gospel temperance.

FINAL MEETINGS IN AMERICA.

About the middle of March, 1880, Mr. Booth was called to speak in the city of Lockport, N. Y., where he labored for four weeks. From Lockport Mr. Booth proceeded to Malden, and there conducted a fortnight's meetings, which were concluded by a grand "farewell" in view of his impending departure for Great Britain. Many friends wished him to cross the ocean that he might devote a brief holiday to rest and the recruiting influences of change of scene in Great Britain and France.

Mr. Booth sailed for England in the Anchoria of the Anchor Line, and was on board that vessel when she collided with the Queen on June 13th, 1880. (See frontispiece.) The two ships returned to New York, and on July 21st Mr. Booth again embarked for England, this time on the Scythia, of the Cunard Line. The voyage was safely accomplished, and Mr. Booth on landing proceeded to London, where, on August 7th, he was formally welcomed by a number of earnest English workers at Hoxton Hall, and many kind and brotherly greetings were uttered. There, in the absence of Mr. Noble, he continued to labor for five or six weeks. Invitations were then responded to from the provinces, and he gave addresses at Newmarket, Tunbridge Wells, and other places in and near London. He afterward proceeded to Scotland, speaking to large audiences in the cities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Greenock, and Peebles.

A GROG-SELLER'S PLEDGE.

On January 9th, 1881, Mr. Booth entered upon a ten days' mission at Cardiff, South Wales, where the work was solid and deep. Over seven thousand signatures were taken during his stay, and the meetings have been continued with no small success since his departure. An incident occurred at Cardiff that deserves to be placed on record as the first of its kind, in the advocate's experience, in Great Britain. A saloon-keeper who had long kept a house of very low repute, and was about to commence the business in another, went to one of the meetings of the series and signed the pledge, amid a scene of indescribable enthusiasm. The people threw caps, handkerchiefs, and shawls into the air in token of their delight. His wife, two sons, a daughter, and two brothers followed his example. The liquor dealer went next day to the prayer-meeting and knelt down on the floor in the presence of all who were assembled. Mr. Booth asked him if he would there and then give his heart to God, to which the man replied, "I have done so; I am trusting in Jesus this moment."

Mr. Booth afterward held meetings at Darlington, Kidderminster, Ipswich, Leeds, Leicester, and other towns, where he was cordially received and where he was very successful. In the summer of 1882 he paid a brief visit to America for rest and recuperation, but returned to England in August and recommenced his labors.

AT THE TABERNACLE.

At the request of Mr. Spurgeon Mr. Booth in August commenced a mission in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, which was eminently successful. At an immense meeting held on September 8th, 1881 the vast edifice, which is capable of accommodating seven thousand persons, was filled to overflowing. Mr. Spurgeon presided.

In addressing the meeting he said drunkenness was one of the worst of sins. It was an awful sin in itself. He would say that the worship of Bacchus was one of the most degrading that could befall a fellow-being. It was a degradation beyond the worship of the wooden image or the stone idol. He had seen youth blasted and old age without hope on account of this besetting evil. Was it, he asked, not killing a man when the attributes that make man above the brute creation were taken from him, and when he was left by his fellow-men to reel to and fro; when his tongue became speechless; when his eyes could not see; when he blubbered and stammered, and when, in fact, he or any one else did not know what he was about? This evil of intemperance was the burglar that opened the door for the admission of other foul and fell intruders. It blighted hopes and blasted prospects; it ruined men day by day, from the young branch to the aged stem of the social circle, and its effects were sadly visible everywhere around them.

A TESTIMONIAL.

On Tuesday, September 12th, another meeting was held in the same building for the purpose of making a presentation to Mr. and Mrs. Booth as an acknowledgment of the good effected during the ten days' mission. Mr. Dunn, one of Mr. Spurgeon's elders, dwelt upon the marvellous work which had been accomplished in their midst. Up to that evening 21,695 persons had taken the blue ribbon, and no fewer than 11,325 had signed the pledge. They were also thankful for the spiritual blessing that had resulted from Mr. Booth's labors. He begged Mr. Booth's acceptance of a timepiece suitably inscribed as a farewell expression of esteem, and bearing the signature of Mr. Spurgeon and his brother. Mr. Smithers, secretary of the committee, presented Mrs. Booth with a flower-basket, while Mrs. Smithers, as representing the ladies' committee, handed Mr. Booth an ink-stand. Mr. Spurgeon next presented Mr. Booth with a set of his sermons.

THE THREE SICKLES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached in Chicago on Sunday, Dec. 16, 1883.*

"Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest."—JOHN 4 : 35.

Interval between Planting and Reaping—A Harvest in a Day—The Spiritual Harvest—Immediate Results Promised—The Value of the Crop—What a Man is Worth—Men Wrongly Placed on the Ladder—The Money-Test Worthless—Millionnaires Despoiled—Sickles for the Spiritual Harvest—I. Preaching—Reapers to Stoop and Kneel—Everywhere and Always—An Artist's Disappointment — II. Christian Song — Soldiers Singing at Luthen—III. Prayer—Luther's Prayer for Melancthon—Dr. Prime in a Mausoleum—The Handless Hospital Patient—The Time to Reap—The Sickle of the Sunday School Teacher—Three Trumpet Blasts—An Infamous Club in Philadelphia Converted—A Great Undertaking—What is Faith?

IN hyperborean regions the farmers sow the seed right after sunrise and reap the crop before the sunset of the same day. But the day is six months long. In Palestine four months elapse between the planting and the reaping. No farmer having scattered the seed in the ground expected to get the crop until four months had gone by. "Now," says Christ, "I do not want you to think that because you have to wait a certain number of months to get the natural harvest, you will have to wait as long as that for the spiritual. I want to show you that there is such a thing as immediate results. 'Say not you, there are yet four months, and then cometh the harvest? Behold, I say unto you, lift up your eyes and look on the fields, for they are white already to the harvest.'"

THE SPIRITUAL HARVEST.

Recently there was great rejoicing all over the land. With trumpet and cornet and organ and thousand-voiced psalm we praised the Lord for the temporal harvests. We praised God for the wheat, the rye, the oats, the cotton, the rice, all the fruits of the orchard and all the grains of the fields; and the nation never does a better thing than when in the autumn it gathers to festivity and thanks God for the greatness of the harvest. But I come to-day to speak to you of richer harvests, even the spiritual. How shall we estimate

THE VALUE OF A MAN?

We say he is worth so many dollars, or he has achieved such and such a position; but we know very well there are some men at the top of the ladder who ought to be at the bottom, and some at the bottom who ought to be at the top, and the only way to estimate a man is by his soul. We all know that we shall live forever. Death cannot kill us. Other crafts may be drawn into the whirlpool or shivered on the rocks, but this life within us will weather all storms and drop no anchor, and ten million years after death will shake out signals on the high seas of eternity.

You put the mendicant off your doorstep, and you say he is only a beggar; but he is worth all the gold of the mountains, worth all the pearls of the sea, worth the solid earth, worth sun and moon and stars, worth the entire material universe. Take all the paper that ever came from the paper-mills and put it side by side and sheet by sheet, and let men with fleetest pens make figures on that paper for ten thousand years, and they will only have begun to express the value of the soul.

Suppose I owned Colorado and Nevada and Australia, of how much value would they be to me one moment after I departed this life? How much of Philadelphia does Stephen Girard own to-day? How much of Boston property does Abbott Lawrence own to-day? The man who to-day hath a dollar in his pocket hath more worldly estate than the millionnaire who died last year. How do you suppose I feel, standing here surrounded by thousands of souls, each one worth more than the material universe? Oh, was I not right in saying this spiritual harvest is richer than the temporal harvest? I must tighten the girdle, I must sharpen the sickle, I must be careful how I swing the instrument for gathering this grain lest one stalk be lost.

I. One of the most powerful

this spiritual harvest is the preaching of the Gospel. If the sickle have a rosewood handle and it be adorned with precious stones, and yet it cannot bring down the grain, it is not much of a sickle, and preaching amounts to nothing unless it harvests souls for God. Shall we preach philosophy? The Ralph Waldo Emersons beat us at that. Shall we preach science? The Agassizes could beat us at that. The minister of Jesus Christ with weakest arm going forth in earnest prayer and wielding this sickle of the Gospel shall find the harvest all around him waiting for the angel sheaf-binders. Oh, this harvest of souls!

I noticed in the fields that the farmer did not stand upright when he gathered the grain. I noticed he had to stoop to his work, and I noticed in order to bind the sheaves the better he had to put his knee upon them. And as we go forth in this work for God, we cannot stand upright in our rhetoric and our metaphysics and our erudition. We have to stoop to our work. Ay, we have to put our knee to it or we will never gather sheaves for the Lord's garner. Peter swung that sickle on the day of Pentecost, and three thousand sheaves came in. Richard Baxter swung that sickle at Kidderminster, and McCheyne at Dundee, and vast multitudes came into the kingdom of our God.

REAP EVERYWHERE AND ALWAYS.

Oh, this is a mighty Gospel! It captured not only John the lamb, but Paul the lion. Men may gnash their teeth at it and clench their fists, but it is the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation. But, alas, if it is only preached in pulpits and on Sabbath days! We must go forth in our stores, our shops, our banking-houses, our factories, and the streets, and everywhere preach Christ. We stand in our pulpits for two hours on the Sabbath and commend Christ to the people; but there are one hundred and sixty-eight hours in the week, and what are the two hours on Sabbath as against the one hundred and sixty-six?

Oh, there comes down the ordination of God this day upon all the people, men who toil with head and hand and foot—the ordination comes upon all merchants, upon all mechanics, upon all toilers, and God says to you as He says to me: "Go teach all nations. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." Mighty Gospel, let the whole earth hear it! The story of Christ is to regenerate the nations, it is to eradicate all wrong, it is to turn the earth into a paradise.

An old artist painted the Lord's Supper, and he wanted the chief attention directed to the face of Christ. When he invited his friends in to criticise the picture, they admired the chalices more than they did the face, and then the old artist said: "This picture is a failure." And he dashed out the picture of the cups, and said: "I shall have nothing to detract from the face of the Lord; Christ is the all of this picture."

II. Another powerful sickle for the reaping of this harvest is

CHRISTIAN SONG.

I know in many churches the whole work is delegated to a few people standing in the organ-loft. But, my friends, as others cannot repent for us and others cannot die for us, we cannot delegate to others the work of singing for us. While a few drilled artists shall take the chants and execute the more skilful music, when the hymn is given out let there be hundreds and thousands of voices uniting in the acclamation. On the way to grandeurs that never cease and glories that never die, let us sing. At the battle of Luthen a general came to the king and said: "Those soldiers are singing as they are going into battle. Shall I stop them?" "No," said the king; "men that can sing like that can fight." Oh, the power of Christian song!

When I argue here, you may argue back. The argument you make against religion may be more skilful than the argument I make in behalf of religion. But who can stand before the pathos of some uplifted song like that which we sometimes sing:

"Show pity, Lord, O Lord forgive!
Let a repenting rebel live!
Are not Thy mercies large and free?
May not a sinner trust in Thee?"

III. Another mighty sickle for the reaping of this Gospel harvest is

PRAYER.

What does God do with our prayers? Does He go on the battlements of heaven and throw them off? No. What do you do with gifts given you by those who love you very much? You keep them with great sacredness. And do you suppose God will take our prayers offered in the sincerity and love of our hearts and scatter them to the winds? Oh, no! He will answer them all in some way.

Oh, what a mighty thing prayer is. It is not a long rigmarole of "Ohs" and "Ahs" and "Forever and ever, Amens." It is a breathing of the heart into the heart of God. Oh, what a mighty thing prayer is! Elijah with it reached up to the clouds and shook down the showers; with it John Knox shook Scotland; with it Martin Luther shook the earth. And when Philip Melanchthon lay sick unto death, as many supposed, Martin Luther came in and said: "Philip, we can't spare you!" "Oh," said he, "Martin, you must let me go; I am tired of persecution and tired of life. I want to go to be with my God." "No," said Martin Luther, "you shall not go; you must take this food, and then I will pray for you." "No, Martin," said Melanchthon, "you must let me go." Martin Luther said: "You take this food or I will excommunicate you." He took the food, and Martin Luther knelt down and prayed as only he could pray, and convalescence came, and Martin Luther went back and said to his friends: "God has saved the life of Philip Melanchthon in direct answer to my prayer." Oh, the power of prayer!

HAVE YOU TESTED IT?

Dr. Prime, of New York, in his beautiful book entitled "Around the World," describes a mausoleum in India which it took twenty thousand men for twenty-two years to build—that and the buildings surrounding—and he says: "Standing in that mausoleum and uttering a word it echoed back from a height of one hundred and fifty feet; not an ordinary echo but a prolonged music, as though there were angels hovering in the air." And every word of earnest prayer we utter has an echo, not from the marble cupola of an earthly mausoleum, but from the heart of God and from the wings of angels as they hover, crying: "Behold, he prays!" Oh, test it! Mighty sickle for reaping this Gospel harvest; the sickle of prayer!

It does not make so much difference about the posture you take—whether you sit, stand, or kneel, or lie on your face, or in your physical agonies lie on your back. It does not make any difference about the physical posture, as was shown when the chaplain said, as he looked over the beds of suffering: "Let all those wounded men here who would like to be prayed for lift the hand!" Some lifted two hands, others lifted one hand, some with hands amputated could only lift the stump of the arm. One man, both his arms amputated, could give no signal except to say: "Me! Me!" Oh, it does not make any difference about the rhetoric of your prayers, it does not make any difference about the posture, it does not make any difference whether you can lift a hand or have no hand to lift, God is ready to hear you. Prayer is answered. God is waiting to respond.

THE TIME TO REAP.

"But," says some one, "when is this harvest

* We are indebted for the report of this powerful sermon to the kindness and courtesy of T. B. Preston, Esq., of the New York Herald.

to be reaped?" My text tells you, Now. "Lift up your eyes upon the fields, for they are white already to the harvest!" How many have you reaped for God? Do you ask me how many I have reaped for God? I cannot say. Now can you say how many you have reaped? I hope there are some who have been brought into the kingdom of God through your instrumentality. Have there not been? Not one? You, a man thirty-five, forty, fifty years of age, and not one? I see souls coming up to glory. Here is a Sunday-school teacher bringing ten or fifteen souls. Here is a tract distributor, bringing forty or fifty souls. Here is a man you never heard of who has been very useful in bringing souls to God. He comes with a hundred and fifty souls. They are the sheaves of his harvest. How many have you brought? Not one. Can it be?

WHAT WILL GOD SAY?

What will the angels say? Better crouch down in some corner of heaven and never show yourself. Oh, that harvest is to be reaped now. And that is this instant! Why not be reaped for God this morning?

"Oh," says some man, "I have been going on the wrong road for thirty, forty, fifty years; I have gone through the whole catalogue of crime, and I must first get myself fixed up." Ah, you will never get yourself fixed up until Christ takes you in charge. You get worse and worse until He comes to the rescue. "Not the righteous; sinners Jesus came to call." So you see I take the very worst case there is. If there is a man here who feels he is all right in heart and life, I am not talking to him, for he is probably a hypocrite. I will talk to him some other time. But if there is a man who feels himself all wrong, to him I address myself.

Though you be wounded in the hands and wounded in the feet and wounded in the head and wounded in the heart, and though the gangrene of eternal death be upon you, one drop of the elixir of divine life will cure your soul. Though you be soaked in evil indulgences, though your feet have gone in unclean places, though you have companioned with the abandoned and the lost, one touch of divine grace will save your soul.

I do not say you will not have struggles after that. Oh, no! But they will be a different kind of struggles. You go into that battle, and all hell is against you, and you are alone, and you fight and you fight, weaker and weaker and weaker, until at last you fall, and the powers of darkness trample on your soul. But in the other case you go into the battle, and you fight stronger and stronger and stronger until the evil propensity goes down, and you get the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Oh, come out of your sins! Have you not been bruised with sin long enough? Have you not carried that load long enough? Have you not fought that battle long enough?

THREE TRUMPET BLASTS.

I rattle the gates of your sepulchre to-day. I take the trumpet of the Gospel and blow the long, loud blast. Roland went into battle. Charlemagne's army had been driven back by the three armies of the Saracens, and Roland in almost despair took up the trumpet and blew three blasts in one of the mountain passes, and under the power of those three blasts the Saracens recoiled and fled in terror. But history says when he had blown the third blast Roland's trumpet broke. I take this trumpet of the Gospel and I blow the first blast: "Whosoever will." I blow the second blast: "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found." I blow the third blast: "Now is the accepted time."

But the trumpet does not break. It was handed down by our fathers, to us, and we will hand it down to our children, that after we are dead they may blow the trumpet, telling the world that we have a pardoning God, a loving God, a sympathetic God, and that more to Him than the throne on which He sits is the joy of seeing a prodigal put his finger on the latch of his father's house. I invite any one the most infidel, any one the most atheistic, I invite him into the kingdom of God with just as much heartiness as those who have for fifty years been under the teaching of the Gospel and believed it all.

When I was living in Philadelphia a gentleman told me of a scene in which he was a participant. In Callowhill Street, in Philadelphia, there had been going on for some time, and many were converted, and among others one of the prominent members of the worst club-house in that city. The next night the leader of that club-house, the president of it, resolved that he would go down and get his comrade away. He came to the door, and before he entered he heard a Christian song, and under its power his soul was agitated. He went in and asked for prayer. Before he came out he was a subject of converting mercy. The next night another comrade went to reclaim those two who had been lost to their sinful circle. He went, and under the power of the Holy Ghost became a changed man. And the work went on until they were all saved and the infamous club-house disbanded. Oh, it is a mighty Gospel! Though you came in here this morning a child of sin, you can go away a child of grace, you can go away singing:

"Amazing grace, how sweet the sound
That saved a wretch like me;
I once was lost, but now am found,
Was blind, but now I see."

Oh, give up your sin! Most of your life is already gone. Your children are going on the same bad road. Why do you not stop? "This day is salvation come to thy house." Why not this moment look up into the face of Christ and say:

"Just as I am, without one plea
But that Thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bidst me come to Thee.
O Lamb of God, I come, I come."

God is going to save you. You are going to be among the shining ones. After the toils of life are over, you are going up to the everlasting rest, you are going up to join your loved ones, departed parents and departed children. "Oh, my God," says some man, "how can I come to Thee? I am so far off. Who will help me, I am so weak? It seems such

A GREAT UNDERTAKING."

Ah, my brother, it is a great undertaking. It is so great you cannot accomplish it, but Christ can do the work. He will correct your heart and He will correct your life. "Oh," you say, "I will stop profanity." That will not save you. "Oh," you say, "I will stop Sabbath-breaking." That will not save you. There is only one door into the kingdom of God, and that is faith; only one ship that sails for heaven, and that is faith. Faith the first step, the second step, the hundredth step, the thousandth step, the last step. By faith we enter the kingdom. By faith we keep in. In faith we die. Heaven a reward of faith. The earthquake shook down the Philippian dungeon. The jailer said: "What shall I do?" Some of you would say: "Better get out of the place before the walls crush you." What did the Apostle say: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." "Ah," you say, "there's the rub."

WHAT IS FAITH?

Suppose you were thirsty, and I offered you this glass of water and you believed I mean to give it to you, and you come up and take it You exercise faith. You believe I mean to keep my promise. Christ offers you the water of everlasting life. You take it. That is faith.

Enter into the kingdom of God. Enter now. The door of life is set wide open. I plead with you by the bloody sweat of Gethsemane and the death-groan of Golgotha, by cross and crown, by Pilate's court-room and Joseph's sepulchre, by harps and chains, by kingdoms of light and realms of darkness, by the trumpet of the archangel that shall wake the dead, and by the throne of the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb, that you attend now to the things of eternity.

Oh, what a sad thing it will be if, having come so near heaven, we miss it! Oh, to have come within sight of the shining pinnacles of the city, and not have entered! Oh, to have been so near we have seen the mighty throng enter, and we not joining them! Angels of God, fly this way! Good news for you. Tell the story among the redeemed on high! If there be one there especially longing for our salvation, let that one know it now. We put down our sins. We put down our sorrows. Glory be to God for such a hope, for such a pardon, for such a joy, for such a heaven, for such a Christ!

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1883.

The year now approaching its close will not be regarded by the historian as a notable one in the history of the country. Compared with other years it has been uneventful. That it has been so is, in many respects, a cause for thankfulness. The material prosperity of the country has been undisturbed. Neither internal commotions nor complications with other nations have given us cause for apprehension. As we look back at other years in our history, and read intelligence of the state of affairs in other lands, we are enabled to realize the blessings of an uneventful year.

There are positive as well as negative reasons for gratitude. The abundant harvests, with which God has blessed us, call for praise to Him who "crowns the year with His goodness." From all sections of the country the same acknowledgments have been received of a plentiful return from the labors of the tiller of the soil. Our manufactures and our trade have also been prosperous, and there are signs in all our cities and villages of progress in wealth and comfort. While the political economist explains this gratifying condition of the country according to his philosophy, the Christian patriot prefers to offer his thanks to the Almighty Giver of all good, and ascribe to Him the praise for continued national prosperity.

The

history of the year, though not marked by any startling changes, is not altogether barren. Early in the year the bill known as the Pendleton bill for the reform of the civil service was passed by the House, and received the signature of the President.

The attention of Congress was, however, mainly taken up by the discussion of the Tariff bill. As was expected, this question provoked a protracted conflict. The sections of the country are opposed to each other on the subject, and each policy has prominent and able advocates. The bill finally passed was an extremely moderate measure, in which the interests of monopolists were carefully regarded. There are indications that this question will be the crucial one in the approaching Presidential election.

The House of Representatives has now again passed into the control of the Democratic party, and the election, by that party, of Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky, to the Speakership is taken as an indication that a majority of the members would look favorably on further reductions in the tariff.

The rapid progress made in the extinction of our public debt excites the astonishment of the whole world. During the fiscal year, which ended on June 30th last, $137,250,000 was paid off, and in the four months following that date $40,000,000 more was paid.

The elections last fall showed that the Democratic tidal wave of 1882 had lost some of its force. In Ohio a Democratic victory was scored, owing chiefly to the division of public sentiment on the Temperance question rather than to political enthusiasm, but in other States the phenomenal majorities of the year before were largely reduced or wholly disappeared.

THE MORMON QUESTION

during the year has apparently made no progress toward solution, except that the craft and arrogance of the Mormon leaders has strained the forbearance of the Government and the people nearer to its limit. The Edmunds' bill, excluding polygamists from office, is considered a failure. The polygamists obeyed the letter of the law, but succeeded in retaining control of the Legislature and of the most important offices. Governor Morgan's report indicates that the Edmunds' bill served no practical purpose, and he intimates that there is no hope of putting an end to the ulcerous growth on the nation's life other than by a change of government to one but little removed from pure despotism.

Among the events which will render the year memorable are some of a character. One of these was the adoption of a new time standard, affording greater convenience to travellers. After November 18th the railroad time in all cities—and in most cases the general public time—was regulated by the meridian under which the city falls. Thus, instead of there being over fifty standards in the country there are but five, and each of those is an exact hour different from the next.

Another change affecting the masses was the reduction, on October 1st, of domestic postage from three to two cents on half-ounce letters. The unusual appearance of a surplus in the Post-Office suggested this reduction, which is one duly appreciated by the people. The Postal Department granted also another boon to the public in the shape of postal notes, which were issued to the public on September 3d.

An important achievement was completed on August 22d, when the two ends of the Northern Pacific Railroad were joined. A gold spike was used on the occasion. Another great triumph of engineering skill, with which the year 1883 will be associated, was the completion of the New York and Brooklyn Bridge, the most imposing structure of the kind in the world. The triumph of fourteen years of labor, anxiety, and heavy expenditure was won when, on May 25th, 1883, the mayors of the two cities formally received the new means of transit, and President Arthur declared the bridge open. Memorable days also were those of the Newburgh Centennial and the centennial celebration of Evacuation, both of which were observed with enthusiasm and appropriate ceremonies.

The courts of law have in two celebrated cases shed distinction on the year 1883. After a trial of portentous length a Washington jury, on June 14th, pronounced the Star Route defendants "not guilty." As one of the defendants had admitted his guilt in the hearing of the jury, and as he was not excepted from the general verdict, the country had no difficulty in forming an estimate of the character of the jury. The second case referred to was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered on October 15th, that the famous Civil Rights Act was unconstitutional.

The people have not been allowed the opportunity of becoming apathetic in the cause of TEMPERANCE.

There has been no relaxation in the energetic efforts of temperance workers, and the tendency has increased, not to rest satisfied with the acquisition of individual converts, but to push forward for prohibition. Nowhere has the movement been more persistently pressed than in the great State of Ohio. There, in the October election, two amendments to the Constitution on the subject were submitted to the popular vote. Both were declared lost, but the majority against absolute prohibition, according to the official report, was only 70,793 in a total vote of 711,681, and grave doubts exist whether on a recount there would be any majority against it at all. The probabilities are that if the votes had been truly and honestly counted Ohio would take its place among prohibition States. In Iowa a smiliar battle has been waged during the year. The Prohibition Amendment, carried by the people at the previous election, was declared invalid by the Supreme Court, on the ground of technical informalities. It could not be resubmitted at the October election, but the people practically voted upon it by voting for members of the Legislature pledged to put the Amendment formally before the people. The friends of temperance have every reason for encouragement in the records of the year's results.

event of the year was the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of Martin Luther's birth. In the pulpit, in the press, and on the platform of public assembly there was evident a desire to honor the memory of the hero of the Reformation. It was not confined to members of the denomination which bears his name; Protestant Christians of all denominations joined with enthusiasm in the celebration.

The Centennial Conference of the Protestant Episcopal Church, held in Philadelphia in October, was an occasion of much interest.

By the good providence of God, who watches over all our ways, the fatal of the year have been comparatively few. The sinking of the Proteus in Arctic waters on July 25th was a disaster, the full consequences of which we are as yet unable to realize. The Proteus was laden with stores for the relief of Lieutenant Greely and his companions of the American expedition at Lady Franklin Bay. The news that she was caught in the ice and crushed aroused anxiety about the safety of the Greely expedition, of which nothing has now been heard for two years.

One of the most conspicuous fatalities of the year was the calamity on the newly-opened Brooklyn Bridge on Decoration Day. Inefficient police supervision resulted in a block of pedestrians on the bridge, followed by a panic and a desperate struggle for life, in which twelve persons were crushed or trampled to death, and many others seriously injured.

The burning of the Newhall House in Milwaukee, Wis., on January 10th, was another terrible catastrophe. One hundred persons are believed to have perished in the flames. The sinking of a dock and the drowning of sixty-five people at Tivoli, near Baltimore, on July 23d; a terrific cyclone at Rochester, Minn., on August 21st, and a destructive fire at Savannah, Ga., on October 31st, were also notable calamities, which, especially in the localities where they occurred, will prevent the year 1883 ever being forgotten.

IN FOREIGN LANDS

the year has been one of perturbation and uneasiness. France has had two little wars on her hands, neither of which can bring any glory to the Republic. The bombardment of defenceless towns in Madagascar, and the wresting, by force, from the native government, concessions it would not grant freely, is not a proceeding of which a Frenchman can be proud. The indignities put on Mr. Shaw, a British missionary in Madagascar, involved a difficulty with England, which France compromised by the payment of an indemnity. She is now engaged in a war in the far East, where she has seized the province of Tonquin in spite of the remonstrances of China—remonstrances which even yet threaten to end in war between the two countries.

A personal matter has occasioned a coolness between France and her nearest neighbor. The young King of Spain, returning from a visit to the Emperor of Germany, passed through Paris on his way homeward, and intended to remain in that capital a few days. But the German Emperor, in order to show courtesy to Alfonso, had made him a Colonel of Uhlans, an honorary title held by other royal personages in Europe. The Parisians, however, resented the visit of the "Uhlan King," mobbed his carriage, howled at him, and generally insulted him. The German Emperor and Prince Bismarck readily comprehended the cause of Alfonso's unpopularity, and adroitly widened the breach between France and Spain by sending the Crown Prince on a visit to the Spanish capital. The cordiality of his reception there must have been gall and wormwood to the French Government and people. A coarse personal insult offered by a prominent French official to the King of Italy was also noted in Germany, and the Crown Prince took in Rome on his return journey, thus cementing the friendship between Italy and Germany.

The Czar of Russia ventured, after a long delay, to undergo the ceremony of coronation on May 27th. Threats were freely made, and predictions hazarded that the Nihilists would take a hand in the programme, and elaborate precautions were taken to insure the safety of the Czar and his guests. The ceremony was performed safely with costly barbaric magnificence.

A revival in a particularly revolting form of the Jewish persecutions was witnessed in Hungary, where ten Jews were tried for the murder of a girl named Esther Solymosi. It was alleged they had decoyed her into their synagogue, and killed her to obtain human blood for use in the Passover bread. The falsity of the charge was fully proved, but it was evident that hatred of the Jews is prevalent in the district, and public sympathy was with the prosecution.

England has not succeeded in conciliating the people of Ireland. There is no abatement to be seen of the hatred of English rule in that unhappy land, and the hatred has been manifested with characteristic malignity. On two occasions dynamite has been exploded in the public thoroughfares—once near a government building, and once in a tunnel through which a train was passing. Innocent and inoffensive persons were injured in each case.

Egypt continued a source of trouble to England during the year. An outbreak of cholera caused a large number of deaths, and later the activity of El Mahdi, the Mohamedan false prophet, has led to a massacre in the Soudan. General Hicks, an English officer in the Egyptian service, is reported to have been killed with all his troops after three days' hard fighting with El Mahdi and his fanatical followers.

In English domestic affairs the chief interest has centred in the Gospel Temperance movement, which has been effectively aided by Mr. Murphy, Mr. R. T. Booth, and other American workers. The organization of the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army, under the presidency of the Rev. M. Baxter, has been signally blessed during the year in this field of labor. Messrs. Moody and Sankey have continued their mission work in England and Scotland with blessed results, and are now engaged in London, where they expect to remain during the greater part of next year.

THE OBITUARY RECORD of the year on both sides the Atlantic contains the names of many noble workers in Christ's cause as well as many distinguished politicians and public men. In America we have lost, in politics, Alexander H. Stephens, at the time of his death Governor of Georgia; Marshall Jewell, ex-Governor E. D. Morgan, Postmaster-General Howe, Judge Blair, and Judge Jere. S. Black; in philanthrophy, William E. Dodge and Peter Cooper; in science, Dr. J. Marion Sims and Dr. George M. Beard, and in Christian labor, Dr. Edwin F. Hatfield, Dr. Titus Coan, the missionary, Professors Krauth, Cocker, and Wilson, beside many other eminent laborers in the Gospel field.

Death has been busy, too, in Europe. On New Year's Day Leon Gambetta, the French statesman, died; a few days later Gustave Doré, the famous artist, and on August 24th the Comte de Chambord, the head of the French Bourbons. Germany was called to mourn Wagner, the composer. Russia lost her veteran statesman, Gortschakoff and her famous novelist Ivan Tourguénieff. Greece lost her eminent statesman and patriot, M. Commoundouros. In England Dr. Moffat, the grand old missionary of South Africa and the father-in-law of Dr. Livingstone, went to his reward. In the death-list of that country there are also the names of Mr. Thomas B. Smithies, the philanthropist, Captain Mayne Reid, the novelist, Dr. Colenso, the Bishop of Natal, William Chambers, the Edinburgh publisher, Sir George Jessel, the learned Jewish judge, and J. R. Green, the historian.

THE GRACE OF GOD FOR ALL.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 6, Acts 15 : 1–11. Golden Text, verse 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Dissension in the Early Church—The Influence of False Brethren—A Journey to Jerusalem—Working for Christ by the Way—The Meeting in Jerusalem—Christian Pharisees—Satan's Vexatious Operations—Paul's Dividing Line—The Judaizing Spirit—Peter's Conclusive Argument—Self Glory in the Churches—The Close of the First Council.

THE early Church was not exempt from the trial which many of God's children have experienced; especially those who in their meetings give the fullest liberty to the Spirit of God. There were those who abused this advantage and made use of it to introduce teachings out of harmony with the free grace of God, which Paul and his followers taught. Some who "came down from Judea taught the brethren, and said, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved." This led to "no small discussion and disputation with them," on the part of Paul and Barnabas. Was this the Church which once was of "one heart and one soul?" Alas! yes, but declension had already set in; things were not as they had once been.

had already become an expression understood (Gal. 2 : 4) among them. It was at last determined that Paul and Barnabas, the representatives of greater liberty, of real spiritual experience and evangelization, "should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question."

There were no express trains running in those days, and work for God could be done on the journey other than screaming against the noise, across a crowded car, with no certainty of being understood. They "being brought on their way by the Church (i.e. conveyed and lodged by brethren who counted it an honor), passed through Phenice and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles: and they caused great joy unto all the brethren." It is very probable that the men of Judea, who had raised the question about circumcision, caused very little joy to their brethren on the journey. Doctrinal questions are poor food for hungry souls; they may have their place; Paul, who had Christ for his wisdom, did not introduce them everywhere, but he never found any place where he could not tell of the things which the Lord had done, rousing the spirit of praise and joy everywhere.

When they arrived

they were in no hurry to introduce their side of the question, which brought them thither, as we have known many do, who are full of the question of election, or of infant baptism, or of church position, or of the coming of the Lord. They were "received of the Church," and before any disputing took place, "they declared all things that God had done with them." If in the provinces, these glorious tidings of God's grace among the countries in Asia Minor had caused joy, how much more should the Jerusalem Church rejoice, praise God, and sit at the feet of God's servants to learn through them something of missionary zeal. Alas! it was not so; a spirit of debate was abroad among them, which took occasion to manifest itself. "There rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees which believed, saying, That it was needful to circumcise them, and to command them to keep the law of Moses." Paul's journey to Jerusalem at this time was not of man:

"I WENT UP BY REVELATION,"

he said, "and communicated unto them that Gospel which I preach among the Gentiles" (Gal. 2 : 2). What was there peculiar in Paul's preaching? Only that he insisted on the real thing; "newness of life" (Rom. 6 : 4); "a new creature" (II Cor. 5 : 17); old things passing away and all things becoming new; the old man put off and the new man put on (Eph. 4 : 22–24); that those who were dead in sins should be quickened together with Christ (Eph. 2 : 5) and be made "dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ" (Rom. 6 : 11); and all through the free grace of God (Rom. 3 : 24; Gal. 2 : 16–21; Eph. 2 : 8, 9). These realities, which must be experienced, and the fruit of which every man must see, were the staple of Paul's preaching among the Gentiles.

Paul had private interviews with "them which were of reputation," and the result was that even Titus, one of his Greek converts who accompanied him, was not compelled to be circumcised, so thoroughly were they convinced that Paul was in the right, seeking to make men Christians without compelling them to be Jews. All this trouble was brought about by "false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage." Satan is never at a loss to find "false brethren" at hand, who are ready to serve his purpose in bringing children of God into bondage. Whenever a question about doctrine, or about some outward form is so brought to work upon us as to cause us constant harass and perplexity, we may be sure

SATAN IS AT THE BOTTOM OF IT.

When God gives us light upon anything in which we are in darkness, although it may humble us very much, yet such a joy comes over us that He has so lovingly opened our eyes, and the step He shows us is so clear, that instead of harassing us, it calms and strengthens us. God permits these false brethren to try our faith, but there is one sure way of meeting them; it is by renouncing all controversy and coming to the Lord Himself about the question, in restful assurance that He will give us light. If we are quiet and still, He will not fail to show His mind, and then He will enable us to act like Paul in relation to these false brethren, "To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour" (Gal. 2 : 4, 5). In Paul's eyes, seeing as he did in the light of the Holy Ghost, the world was not divided into Jews and Gentiles, but into Christians and worldlings, and he saw such a union among those who were Christ's as to sink all differences of nationality and position; "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3 : 28).

The apostles and elders came together to consider this matter of

JUDAIZING THE GENTILE DISCIPLES.

After much had been said on both sides, Peter rose up and spoke with all the authority of an eye witness, reminding the elders how God had chosen in the first instance, to make use of him to preach to the Gentiles, referring to the glorious work in the house of Cornelius (Acts 10). "And" he said, "God, which knoweth the hearts, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost, even as He did unto us; and put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith." What could be stronger evidence? If God gave the Holy Ghost to uncircumcised, equally as to circumcised, what advantage was it for a believing Gentile to be circumcised? Peter's words were a confirmation of Paul's own teaching. "In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love (Gal. 5 : 6); "but a new creature" (Gal. 6 : 15). Then Peter continued, "Now therefore why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they." Peter had seen with his own eyes the work of God among the Gentiles, and his heart warmed when he heard Paul and Barnabas describe what God had done by them, he rejoiced at the triumphs of God's grace; yes these Gentiles were indeed saved, and saved by grace, and only through grace could the circumcised Jews be saved.

The heart of man is

one man will pride himself on his pedigree (never reckoning from Adam); another's pride is in the country to which he belongs; one will value himself on his being a churchman; another equally on his being a Wesleyan or a Baptist; another will think he has attained the acme of distinction in being a Plymouth Brother. Some again will value themselves on their cleverness in business, some on a special talent, some on their external attractions, some on their Bible knowledge, some on their zeal, some on their self-denial and devotion. But all self-valuation is antagonistic to grace. Grace is God meeting us in our need, in our nothingness, in our powerlessness, coming in to take a place which we have abdicated; the smallest self-complacency shuts out God. It was evident enough from the results that Paul and Barnabas, working in the grace of God, had achieved more than those who would condemn them.

After Peter's speech "the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Barnabas and Paul, declaring what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them." They told of their work in Cyprus, in Pisidian Antioch, in Iconium, where there was so much blessing in the conversion of Jews and Greeks, and where signs and wonders were done by their hands (Acts 14 : 1–3), and then of Lystra, where Paul had been stoned and yet healed by the Lord the same day, and of Derbe. All this produced a profound impression, and subsequently James decided that the Gentile Christians should not be constrained in any way to conform to Jewish usages other than that they should abstain from pollutions of idols, from eating things strangled, from eating blood, and from fornication. Thus ended the first council of the Christian Church, and the Lord gave victory to the word of His grace.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Canny Schoolmaster's Advice.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, who was present at one of the meetings, related this incident: "There is an old story told of a canny Scotchman, whose son was starting for himself in the world. His parting advice was, 'Noo, Jock, mak' money honestly if ye can, 'cause it's the best; I've tried baith plans mysel', but mak' money.' Some here have tried sobriety and drinking, and know abstinence to be the best plan by personal experience. Be sure you take the best plan and get your fellow-men to follow your example."

A Choirmaster's Prayer.—Mr. Moodie, the conductor of the Mizpah Choir, said: "For many weeks prior to Mr. D. L. Moody leaving Scotland, I prayed that God would give me something special to do for Him. I am no speaker, but I was willing to do what I could. At the great meeting a year and a half ago at which this brotherhood was formed, Mr. Moody said, 'Stand up, all those who are in favor of forming a choir.' When they obeyed, he turned to me and said, 'Mr. Moodie, there's your choir.' That's how God answered my prayer."

Croakers Convinced of Error.—Another brother said: "I was bad enough, worse than I care to tell you, up till five years ago, when I accepted Christ as my Saviour from sin and death. When I stopped drinking, my friends told me that I would die if I stopped it suddenly, but not only did I stop drinking, and still live, but smoking as well; the desire for them was taken completely away from me, and they have never troubled me since. The salvation of Christ is a present one, and He is quite able to preserve from falling those who trust Him."

Converted through His Daughter's Death.—Major Colquhoun said: "Death is calling away some of our number. Before coming to this happy meeting I attended the funeral of a young girl, who was converted at Cowcaddens on April 25th, 1883. She has since then been modestly working for Jesus, doing all in her power to win souls, besides testifying by her walk and conversation to the power of God over her heart. Her mother's testimony before the large crowd of mourners was: 'Oh, she was a good girl; she was a good daughter to her mother.' Her sister also bore similar evidence. The men were greatly moved by it, and we hope that her death will not be without fruit." This young Christian's death has, we learn, led to her father giving himself up to Jesus, so that the Major's hope is realized.

A Monument of Divine Mercy.—A Member of the Mizpah Band, in Glasgow, at one of its recent meetings, said: "I'm not ashamed to own my Lord nor to defend His cause. For more than ten years I was a drunkard, and part of that time I professed to be an infidel, but it was mere outward profession, for my conscience told me loudly that there was indeed a God. Two years ago I was awakened by the Holy Spirit of God to a sense of my sins, and praise be to His Name, He redeemed me from them, and has kept me rejoicing ever since. I am a monument of His mercy, and desire to live only for Christ."

A Drunkard's Wife's Prayers Answered.—Another friend said: "It affords me great pleasure to testify to the saving power of God. I see to-night the faces of many who prayed for me during the years I revelled in sin. My wife prayed for me for ten and a half years without failing in her faith; her life and conversation moved my whole soul to think of my folly and loathe it, but it was only after a great struggle that I was enabled by the Holy Spirit to give up my sins and accept Christ as my Saviour, but thank God, He has made me to know His mighty power, and daily fills me with 'joy unspeakable, and full of glory.'"

A Very Common Stumbling-Block.—The Rev. Dr. Fergus Ferguson said: "I was told by a brother-minister that he had a series of special meetings in his church. At one of these a brother from the country spoke on the text, 'Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest.' After the service a woman came into the vestry and said, 'I couldn't go home to-night without telling you that I got rest while you were speaking.' He answered, 'I am very glad to hear it; what part of the address was blessed to you?' 'It wasn't the address, sir, but the text.' 'Did you never hear it before?' 'Oh yes, often; but somehow when you read it I was struck with the thought that I was looking for rest in some feeling in myself instead of going to Jesus for it.' This is the stumbling-block of very many anxious souls, they are peering into the darkness of their own hearts, and do not look to the bright Star of Bethlehem for guidance."

A Backslider Conquered by Song.—Major Colquhoun said: "For more than a year now this outside singing has been kept up night after night in rain and sunshine, in frost and snow, in wind and calm. In West Milton Street a woman has been lying ill with a deadly disease for the last four months. She knows that health can never visit her again, though death may delay his approach. While lying in her room the window was opened so that she might hear the sweet melodies which floated over the church, carrying a message of peace to her weary soul. She sent for me yesterday, and I learned her sad story. In early life she was a member of the Baptist Communion. Having great love for music, and a beautiful voice, she led the choir. When in her teens she married, and her husband induced her to sing for money in music-halls, and used the money she earned to get drink. She stopped going to church, and has been separated from all godly influences since her marriage, but the hymns sung by our friends at the street-corner have been the means of awakening her, and now she is calmly resting on Jesus."

A Heart-moving Scene.—"I Remember a scene in Manchester which moved me greatly. I had gone to preach a teetotal sermon, and the matron of a House of Refuge for fallen women said to the lady with whom I was staying, 'I wish you would get that minister to speak to my girls. I like to get a teetotal minister to speak with them, as it is drink which has brought them to us.' Next day the lady got out her carriage and drove me to the place. My hostess was well known in the House, and was loved by the inmates, so that when we entered, the eighty girls rose to their feet out of respect to her. The matron said, 'Before the minister speaks we will sing the hymn, "I heard the voice of Jesus say, Come unto Me and rest."' The voices of these poor women singing the Gospel-hymn overpowered me so that I could not speak for some little time. They saw I was greatly moved, and my emotion spread to all in the room. When I was able to control my feelings I told them that Jesus whom they sang about was able and willing to save them from all iniquity. It was a Gospel Temperance sermon, preached long before such a phrase as 'Gospel Temperance' was spoken, and I have reason to believe it was blessed to the salvation of many there."

THE MAHOMMEDAN ANTICHRIST'S 1260 YEARS.

By the late Rev. W. Girdlestone, Author of "Observations on the Prophecies," etc.

THE period of 1260 years* is to be dated from the establishment of Mahommedan imposture, which took place in the year A.D. 630, when Mahommed seized possession of the city of Mecca, which thenceforth became the sacred capital of Mahommedanism, and synchronizes therefore with the taking away of the daily sacrifice (Rev. 11 : 2, 3).

Mahommed did not establish his religion or his power till he was master of Mecca; from that time the Mussulman armies poured into Syria, and out of Syria they came down upon Jerusalem.

The little horn of Dan. 8 is described as being a tyrannical king, not inheriting power of his own, but gaining it by the help of others; he is to succeed by the exercise of his understanding and craft; he is to practise and prosper, and to destroy wonderfully, particularly the mighty and holy people; and by peace shall he destroy many, and, above all, he shall stand up against the Prince of princes; he is to arise within the precincts of one of Alexander the Great's four kingdoms, and at a time when the transgressors shall be come to the full.

The transgressors are those who departed from the Christian faith once delivered to the saints; and at the time of Mahommed's appearance, no age, no church, not even Rome herself in the darkest ages, ever witnessed such a medley Christianity, composed of heathenism, Judaism, and Gnosticism, with its variety of schisms and heresies branching and sprouting out of that pestiferous sect, as then disgraced the Greek Church. Had not Mahommed found the soil thus ready prepared, thus richly manured with the rottenness of corruption, and watered to his hand by the poisonous flood from the dragon's mouth, he would not have dared to plant his deadly upas tree, and from under its branches circumscribe with his bloody scimetar an empire which astonished and for ages has amazed the world.

We see in this horn religious tyranny and overbearing character; but he begins and proceeds in his career by dark sentences and craft, by mysterious revelations and persuasion; he destroys not only by the sword but seduction, not only the mighty but the holy people, not only in war but in peace, and he sets himself up against the Prince of princes, our Lord Jesus Christ. He arises at a time when the transgressors are come to the full, and stretches his dominion over the south, and the east, and the pleasant land.

I think that no description of the impostor Mahommed can be given more applicable to him than this; he retired to his cave, and there hatched his pretended mysterious revelation; he came forth, and persuaded a few. By their help his tenets spread, by their assistance he was raised to power, and established that power by the possession of Mecca in the year 630; from thence he pushed his dominion, with the sword in one hand and the Koran in the other, four hundred leagues toward the south and toward the east, which included the pleasant land of Judea.

His Koran is a medley of dark sentences; he prospered no less by his craft than by his sword, for he formed his religion to suit the different tastes, the different manners, the vicious and corrupt inclinations of the people he labored to convert as well as to subdue. To gain the Jew, he reverenced Moses. To entice the Christian, he acknowledged the authority of Jesus Christ. And to reconcile all, he gave a sanction to their worst passions, and indulged their fiercest appetites. He appeared at a time when all seemed ripe for such an apostasy, when the transgressors were come to the full; when Judaism was degraded, Christianity corrupted, and heathenish customs, rites, and manners seemed to preponderate in the mixture of all. But whatever reverence he might pay to Moses or Christ, however he might acknowledge the divinity of their missions, he set up his own as superior to theirs, and exalted himself above the Prince of princes.

The Mahommedan impostor "took away the daily sacrifice, and set up the abomination of desolation" in the following sense:

The Romans, when they conquered the Jewish nation, warred not against the religion of the Jews, they regarded not their superstitions (as they called them) or their ceremonies, these were everywhere tolerated; but their object was to break the political power of this contumacious people, to bend them to their yoke, and to quell their turbulent dispositions; and this they conceived was the more easily to be done, by destroying their city and temple, and driving them out of their country.

Not so the Mahommedan conquerors; they laid their axe at the root of religion, they conquered only that they might convert; they gave their vanquished foe his country, but subverted his religion. It was against the pure worship of the Lord Jesus Christ, which was typified by the Jewish sacrifice, that the Mahommedan arms and Mahommedan craft were levelled; and, as I conceive it, this was the daily sacrifice, or the atoning sacrifice, the true worship, which was taken away and annihilated, as it were, by the Arabian prophet and his followers.

Thus we see that the daily sacrifice was taken away by Mahommed in the year A.D. 630. Add to this 1260 years, the era of the prosperity of the Mahommedan little horn, and we reach the year 1890.

[NOTE BY REV. M. BAXTER.—The foregoing extract from the prophetic exposition published in 1820, by Mr. Girdlestone, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, is valuable, as foreshowing that the 1260 years of Mahommedan temporal power would terminate about A.D. 1890, which is the terminating epoch of other dates. The 63 years which have elapsed since Mr. Girdlestone's exposition have signally verified his views, for the Turko-Mahommedan Empire is greatly shrunk in size and weakened since 1820, and as it is the bulwark and mainstay of the Mahommedan religion, the collapse of one of them will involve that of the other.

In the year-day fulfilment the little horn of Dan. 8 is the Mahommedan Antichrist for 1260 years, and the little horn of Dan. 7 is the Papal Antichrist also for 1260 years. But in the future literal day fulfilment the last personal Infidel Antichrist will be not only the little horn of Dan. 8, but also the little horn of Dan. 7, for 1260 literal days, as the term of his persecuting temporal power; as such he will combine in himself the peculiar distinctive features both of Mahommed and the Pope. They have been, in fact, precursory types of him.]

* The time, times and half a time (Daniel 7 : 25; 11 : 13; 12 : 7) or three and a half years, reckoned according to Jewish mode of 360 days to the year give 1260 years. This is the predicted duration of the supremacy of the Mahommedan power.

READERS should understand that when an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears the name of the writer, that writer must be held individually responsible for the views therein advanced. The ministers whose sermons appear in this journal, and other contributors, must not be regarded as always endorsing views about which there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among Christians of eminent piety and learning.

CURRENT EVENTS.

This Session of Congress Promises to be as prolific in abortive bills as its predecessors. Up to the close of last week the House had received seventeen hundred and sixty bills and sixty-two joint resolutions; the Senate, six hundred and ninety-five bills and fifteen resolutions. Thus the total is already very large, and it is predicted that when Congress meets after the holidays the aggregate of papers and measures before it demanding attention, if not legislation, will run up to four or five thousand. The House bills, like those of the Senate, will largely disappear in the hands of the House committees.

Mr. Keifer, the Speaker of the House, in the last Congress, is threatened with an investigation of his conduct in respect to a matter which caused much public comment at the time. It will be remembered that he discharged one of the stenographers of the House just prior to the recess, and gave the place to his nephew, who consequently was able to draw full salary during the recess when the services of a stenographer are not required. On December 20th, while the House was discussing a resolution proposing to give one month's extra pay to discharged employés, Mr. Reagan moved to commit the resolution to the Committee on Accounts, with instruction to inquire and report whether persons had been discharged at the close of the last session and others put into their places who had performed no duties. Mr. Keifer has also received a snub from his own side of the House. He appears to have expected that the Republicans would recognize him as their leader this session, but though only a few days have elapsed since the House met, his leadership has been repudiated three times. His subserviency to the notorious Mr. Robeson, when in the chair, and his unfairness in the appointment of the committees alienated even those who only a few months ago enthusiastically worked for his election.

A Proposal to Augment the Navy by Building seven new vessels in addition to those already ordered, was made in the Senate on December 17th by Senator Hale. It is exceedingly unfortunate for the country that, owing to past experience, propositions of this character give rise to suspicions of jobbery. On this particular proposal the New York Times significantly remarks: "It is undoubtedly true that the navy is in a dilapidated condition, and that it should be reinforced and augmented. It is also true that the national Treasury is now in a better condition to permit the rebuilding of the navy than at any other time since the closing of the Civil War. But it should be said that intelligent observers of public affairs will view with a certain anxiety any project for augmenting the navy that may emanate from Secretary W. E. Chandler, Senator Hale, or ex-Congressman Robeson."

Another Attempt to Relieve Lieutenant Greely and his companions at Franklin Bay or to meet and assist them if they have commenced the perilous journey homeward is to be made. President Arthur has appointed a commission to take charge of the preparations. The new commission is already at work. Its first meeting was held December 21st, when some preliminary matters were disposed of, and the general line of procedure discussed. General Hazen, who is a member of the commission, said that the commissioners intended to use all possible diligence, as they realized that no time was to be lost. It was hoped to have the relief party ready to start in May and have the vessel or vessels composing it off the coast of Greenland in June. Everything connected with the expedition had been referred to the commissioners, who were to decide when it was to start, how it was to be fitted out, and where it was to go. It was proposed to seek the advice of skilled arctic explorers and navigators, and suggestions were expected from various valuable sources. Lieutenant Schwatka, who made a trip to the arctic regions in the Eothen, had already been communicated with and had agreed to furnish the commission with his views on the matter in detail.

Significant Speeches were Delivered in Irving Hall, New York, on Sunday, December 16th, when the delegates from the French trades-unions were entertained by the New York branch of the International Union. They all predicted the approach of a social revolution. The orator of the day was introduced as "our much-hated and much-beloved John Most," and proceeded at once about his truculent business. After reviewing in sanguinary terms, the labor strifes in Europe and America, he pronounced "Paris the Mecca of the working men." "The French," he shouted, "have often shed their blood against oppression, and have many a time flaunted the black flag of hunger from their barricades and died beneath its sombre folds. It is asked what will the Communists give in place of what they will destroy. That is not to decide now. First, let us wipe out, tear down, annihilate. Then we can talk of building up." This sentiment was greeted with a frenzy of applause, and one excitable citizen jumped to his feet and, pointing to the red flags of the Paris Commune which were suspended over the platform, shrieked at the top of his lungs, "Vive la Commune! Vive la dynamite!" Herr Most evidently desires to commence with the easiest part of the programme.

The Death of Dr. Thomas S. Kirkbride, the eminent authority on insanity, is announced. He died December 17th, aged seventy-four. Dr. Kirkbride had attained a world-wide reputation in the branch of science to which he had given special study. He was a descendant of Joseph Kirkbride, of the Parish of Kirkbride, in the county of Cumberland, England, who came to America with William Penn. He received his education at Trenton, N. J., whence he came to Philadelphia to pursue his medical studies in the medical departmentment of the University of Pennsylvania, which institution conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Medicine in March, 1832. In the autumn of 1840 a new institution for the insane, now well known as the insane department of the Pennsylvania Hospital, was so near its completion that it became necessary to select a superintendent. To this post, in October, 1840, Dr. Kirkbride was elected, and he was the head of the institution ever after. Under the promptings of Dr. Kirkbride an association of the Medical Superintendents of the Insane Asylums of America was formed in 1866, of which he was President for eight years. He was the author of the volume on "The Construction, Organization, and General Arrangements of Hospitals for the Insane," and one on "Rules for the Government of Those Employed in the Care of the Insane." In addition, he contributed a number of valuable monographs and reviews to the American Journal of Insanity and other periodicals. The present use of the humane system of managing insane persons is mainly due to Dr. Kirkbride's efforts.

Mr. W. Forbes Gave an Address on Friday last at the Brooklyn Tabernacle, Dr. Talmage's. As Mr. Forbes leaves New York on Friday next, a conference of temperance friends and a valedictory meeting will be held in the Lecture-Room of Association Building, Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York, at 7.30 P.M., on Thursday, 27th. Any of our readers will be welcome to this meeting. Communications for Mr. Forbes may be sent to this office.

Contributions to the Hospital Saturday and Sunday Fund, in New York, are earnestly requested by the committee in New York. In so good a cause it is unnecessary to say a word beyond the publication of the committee's notification. Hospital Saturday and Sunday are December 29th and 30th. Gifts toward current expenses, the endowment of beds, or for building purposes may be designated for any hospital in the city, and will be forwarded through the treasury of the association to the hospital named. Contributions, however, are especially solicited on the days named for the general fund, which will be distributed among the associated hospitals, according to the by-laws of the association. Collections will be made in all the churches on Sunday next and in all the synagogues next Saturday. The other channels for contributions are auxiliary associations, through committees in exchanges, and subscription lists circulated in exchanges and among the trades, subscription lists in the hands of the managers of each of the hospitals, and collection boxes at the elevated railway stations. Money or checks may be sent to Charles Lanier, the General Treasurer, No. 26 Nassau Street.

An All-Day Prayer-Meeting in Chicago was conducted on December 10th by Miss Jennie Smith. The meeting commenced at nine o'clock in the morning, and continued without interruption until nine in the evening; the hall was crowded during the entire day. Many of the pastors of the churches in the city were interested, and took part in the services. Miss Smith gave a history of her illness and cure through faith and prayer at the services in the evening.

The New Misssonary Bishop of the Episcopal Church in North Dakota, the Rev. William David Walker, was consecrated on December 20th at Calvary Episcopal Church, New York, with impressive ceremonies. At 11 o'clock the male choir, which consisted of sixty students from the General Theological Seminary of this City, dressed in black collegiate gowns, marched up the aisle singing the processional hymn, and took places on either side of the chancel. They were followed by about two hundred visiting clergymen, clad in white surplices, who took seats in the centre of the church facing the altar; after them came the officiating bishops, and lastly the newly elected bishop. The bishops were met at the altar steps by Assistant Bishop H. C. Potter and given seats within the chancel rail. The sermon was preached by Bishop Coxe, who briefly reviewed the early missionary work of the Church in this country since it has been under an episcopacy of its own. At the conclusion of his address the order of consecration was taken up and finished. Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island, acted as the presiding bishop, and the candidate was presented by Assistant Bishop Potter. The services ended with the communion. Bishop Walker graduated from the General Theological Seminary in 1862, and has been connected with Calvary Church ever since. Sixteen years ago he was made Missionary Rector of Calvary Chapel, and through his exertions the building, which cost $60,000, was erected.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Crown Prince of Germany has been Enthusiastically welcomed in Rome, where he arrived on December 17th. The King of Italy met him at the depot, and cordially greeted him as he stepped from the car. The city was illuminated in his honor, and crowds of citizens cheered the prince as he passed through the streets. In order to accommodate the scruples of the Pope, the Prince left the Royal Palace, the Quirinal, where he was staying as the guest of the King, and drove to the German Embassy. From that place he drove to the Vatican to have an audience with the Pope. Subsequently a representative of the Pope visited the Prince at the German Embassy, after which the Prince returned to the Quirinal. The private interview between the Pope and the Prince lasted an hour, and the European journals are speculating as to the probable subjects discussed.

A French Victory is Announced as Having been won before Sontay, which is regarded as the key of the Red River delta. It is to the west of Bac Ninh, and occupies a commanding position either for controlling Tonquin or for operating against China. Sontay at last reports was said to be occupied by Chinese troops, but whether they are actually Chinese or only Black Flags, for whose actions the Chinese Government is not held responsible, is unknown. The French admiral, telegraphing the report of his victory, states that a combined attack of the flotillas and land forces was made on five villages on the road to Sontay, and though they were strongly fortified and bravely defended they were captured by the French troops. The march to Sontay was then commenced. Sontay is defended by a citadel constructed of bricks and masonry and supported by earthworks. Its capture was announced in a brief telegram from Hong Kong on Saturday last. The French force appears to have suffered heavy losses.

The Dynamite Conspirators Arrested in Glasgow have been tried in Edinburgh and convicted. There are eight of them beside Callaghan and McDermott. They were charged with being members of a secret society the object of which is to overthrow the authority of Queen Victoria in Ireland, and to constrain Parliamentary legislation in regard to Ireland, and that, acting with Featherstone and Dalton, they conspired to blow up public buildings at Glasgow. The prisoners pleaded not guilty, and brought witnesses, chiefly relatives of the accused, to prove an alibi. The jury on December 21st rendered a verdict against five of them of "guilty," on all the counts of the indictment, and against the other five of guilty on the minor charges. The former five were sentenced to penal servitude for life, and the latter to penal servitude for five years.

The Responsibility for the Cimbria Disaster, which occurred on January 19th, nearly a year ago, has not been fixed by the Court of Inquiry. The Cimbria, it will be remembered, was sunk by collision with the British steamship Sultan in the German Ocean. Four hundred immigrants are believed to have been on board. The court, in its judgment, leaves the question of the responsibility for the collision undecided, but attributes it to the Cimbria porting her helm and the Sultan starboarding hers, and to the fact that both vessels omitted to reverse their engines at full speed. The manner in which the Sultan was managed after the collision, the court says, showed that her officers lost their presence of mind, and thus failed to aid the Cimbria. The general opinion at the time was that the captain of the Sultan displayed carelessness and inhumanity, but the court apparently considers the charge not proven.

O'Donnell, the Murderer of Carey, Paid the penalty of his crime on December 17th. The British Government courteously replied to the request of President Arthur, presented by Mr. Lowell, for delay, that the grounds of the application had been already considered and decided. There was, therefore, no reason for postponing the execution, and it accordingly took place in Newgate Jail, in private, on the day fixed. O'Donnell is reported to have overcome the agitation he manifested at his trial, and to have died calmly and with fortitude. It is doubtful if a man ever sacrified his life for a more unworthy cause. The man he killed was one of the vilest of the vile, and at the time of his death was fleeing from the vengeance of his former associates. He planned and superintended the execution of the Phœnix Park murders, and then assisted in bringing to punishment the men who did his bidding. It is no wonder that his escape from the gallows exasperated the relatives and friends of his victims, as it did the majority of his fellow-citizens. But O'Donnell, whether acting on his own responsibility or as the delegate of others, in killing the worthless fellow broke the law, and, just now, respect for the law is a lesson Ireland needs to learn. That was doubtless the reason why the self-constiuted avenger of blood was not spared.

Mr. Shaw, the English Missionary to Madagascar, whom the French admiral ill treated, in the course of an address recently given in England, corrected the impression that the whole of Madagascar had been Christianized. Three fourths of the island were still in the darkest heathenism. The missionary work on the eastern side of the island had met with very grave opposition; indeed, the work for a time had been altogether upset. Mr. Shaw enlarged upon the defenceless condition of the seven "villages" destroyed by the French, whose idea of law, he thought, was very different from that of other people.

Mr. Moody is now at the World's End. That is the familiar name applied to Stepney, the London suburb in which the Iron Hall now stands. It is surrounded by the class included in the term "outcast London," and those interested in the denizens of the slums will thus have a chance of showing their practical Christianity. The ministers are going in heartily with the movement. One of them lends his church for overflow meetings. As a memorial of the work at Wandsworth, Dr. Watney has made over the site upon which the hall stood to six gentlemen on a lease for ninety-nine years. Here a temporary structure, capable of seating one thousand persons, will be run up as soon as the hall is removed. In addition to giving the site, Dr. Watney will also bear all the preliminary expenses. In this structure the services will be continued, and in course of time a permanent building will be erected, to become a centre of religious effort for the locality.

Mr. R. T. Booth, the American Temperance orator, whose portrait appears on the first page, is about to visit Australia for the benefit of his health. He was entertained at a farewell meeting in Southampton before embarking. Canon Wilberforce, who presided, paid an eloquent tribute of respect to the work and worth of Mr. Booth. He had, he said, had abundant opportunity of testing his character, and declared that he had never seen an action or heard a word that the most carping critic could object to. He pointed out that Mr. Booth had been the moving spirit in the great work of reform now going on up and down Great Britain. Another speaker said: "Mr. Booth has held thirty-five missions in all the principal cities and towns of the United Kingdom, and addressed some hundreds of meetings. The results are enormous. At Longton, where his first mission was held, 6000 signed the pledge; at Birmingham, 51,000; at Bristol, 25,000; at Brighton, 21,000; at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, 12,500. As to the permanency of the work, I have made an independent inquiry in some cases, and find that at Liverpool, the 'black spot on the Mersey,' and the most drink-besotten city in England, 92 per cent have remained firm; at Swansea, 90; and in other towns 85 per cent. Mr. Booth is accompanied to Australia by Mr. T. W. Glover, an energetic agent of the United Kingdom Alliance, which is the organization in charge of the Prohibition movement in Great Britain.

MOURNERS, INQUIRERS, COVENANTERS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"In those days, and in that time, saith the Lord, the children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together, going and weeping: they shall go, and seek the Lord their God. They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward, saying, Come, and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten."—JEREMIAH 1:4, 5.

THE previous part of this chapter declares the overthrow of Israel's cruel oppressor: "Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, Merodach is broken in pieces." The Assyrian and Babylonian power had been the great tyrant of the ages, and the Lord had employed it for the chastening of His people, until at last Israel and Judah had been carried away captive to the banks of the Euphrates, and the land of their fathers knew them no more. This was the mournful song of the exiles, "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion." What a turn would come! In the day when God would reckon with Babylon, and punish the haughty people for their cruelties and oppressions, then should Israel and Judah come to their own again. God doth devise means for bringing back His banished ones, and among those ways we usually see the overthrow of their conquerors. When, therefore, the Lord deals with Babylon in a way of vengeance it is that He may deliver His own people.

I will not talk much with you concerning the Chaldeans and the Jews, but I would speak concerning ourselves. We, too, by nature are in banishment, far off from our God and the abode of His glory. It is a great blessing when the times come, and they have come, when there is an opportunity and

AN INVITATION TO RETURN.

To-day the power of the adversary is broken, and we may flee out of the Babylon of sin.

At such times, when the Lord is leading men to seek His face, questions arise, anxieties abound, and difficulties multiply. The lost tribes could not come back from Babylon by merely thinking of it: the way was long and dangerous, the paths were unknown and difficult, and they who came back to Zion found the journey to be no promenade of pleasure or parade of pomp. It is so with the Lord's banished when He gives them a heart and a will to return to Him; they are not, therefore, restored to the Father's house at once: they may have to persevere through months of weary pilgrimage before they come to their desired abode. I earnestly desire to be the means in the hand of God of answering questions, removing fears, and clearing the way for those who have begun to seek the Lord.

Every one who is really seeking the Lord desires to be sure that he is seeking aright; he is not willing to take anything for granted, since his soul is of too much value to be left at hazard. He does not even believe in his own judgment of himself, but when he thinks his face is toward Zion, he still

ASKS THE WAY.

He inquires, "Are my feelings like those of the truly penitent? Am I believing as those do who are justified by faith? Am I seeking the Lord in a manner which will be pleasing to Him?" They have so long been as lost sheep, going from mountain to hill, that they have forgotten their resting places, therefore in their confusion they are afraid of going wrong again, and so they inquire with eager anxiety.

Perhaps we may show them from this Scripture how others sought and how others found, and this may be a guide and a comfort to them; for albeit there are differences of operation, and all do not come to Christ with equal terrors, or with equal joys, yet there is a likeness in all the pilgrims to the holy city. "As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man;" the experience of God's people in its root principles is evermore the same. All coming sinners endure like griefs, and pass through similar struggles: the same desires, the same fears, the same hopes, and by and by the same realizations are to be found in all those who seek unto the Lord their God.

Looking carefully at the text, we perceive that those who came back to Zion by God's gracious leadership, were first mourners; secondly, inquirers; and thirdly, covenanters; for they ended by joining themselves unto the Lord in a perpetual covenant.

I. To begin at the beginning, the Lord's restored ones during the processes of grace were first of all

MOURNERS:

"In those days, and in that time, saith the Lord, the children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together, going and weeping; they shall go, and seek the Lord their God." Oh, my hearer, after all your sins I will not believe that you are truly coming to God, if there is not about you a great sorrow for sin and a lamenting after the Lord. Some seekers are made to drink of this bitter cup very deeply; the wine of astonishment is long kept to their lips; their sense of sin is terrible, even to anguish and agony. I know that there are others who do not taste this bitterness to the same degree; but it is in their cup, for all that, only the sweet love of Christ is revealed to them so soon and so fully that the healthful wormwood of penitence is veiled beneath the exceeding sweetness of gracious pardon.

While the heart feels no compunction concerning its wanderings, no mourning over its guilt, no grief at having grieved the Lord, there can be no acceptance with God. There must be a shower in the day of mercy; not always a long driving rain causing a flood, but the soft drops must fall in every case. There must be tenderness toward God, if we expect reconciliation with God. The heart must cry, "How could I have sinned against so good a Lord! How could I have stood out against His love! How could I have refused my Saviour and His abounding grace! My God, forgive me!" Of all the ransomed it is written, "They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them."

Observe that this mourning in the case of Israel and Judah was so strong that it mastered other feelings. Between Judah and Israel there was an old feud. They were brethren, and it ought not to have been so; but they had become bitter adversaries of each other. Yet now that they return unto the Lord, we read, "The children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together." O happy union in for God! One of the first results of holy sorrow for sin is to cast out of our heart all forms of enmity and strife with our fellow-men. If a man, professing to be a penitent, drew back at the sight of another who also came penitently to Christ, and said, "I can have nothing to do with him," I should unhesitatingly declare him to be a hypocrite; or even if he were sincere, I should have to tell him that to a certainty the Lord could not and would not accept his repentance or grant him peace. If thou wilt not forgive thy brother, how shall God forgive thee? As Aaron's rod swallowed up all other rods, so a sincere sorrow for sin will remove all readiness to take offence against our fellow-sinners. In the secret chambers of their souls the truly penitent say, "Everything that I have against any man is gone now, for I remember nothing but that I have offended against my God. If the Lord will forgive my wrong, everything I have had to bear from others shall be as the small dust of the balance, not worthy to be considered or thought of in the day of infinite grace."

I am trying so to preach that I may help you who are seeking the Lord to discover whether you are coming aright. This shall be one simple test to you—you cannot be coming home to your Father unless there is some degree of mourning for sin, some smiting upon the breast, some bemoaning of yourself because of your iniquities; and again, for certain, you cannot be coming to the Lord aright unless there is a blotting out altogether from your heart of every offence that every man may have committed against you in past times.

Keeping close to the text, we notice again that the exiles on their return were mourning while marching. Observe the words—"going and weeping." We might have thought, perhaps, that when they began to go to their God, so much light would break in upon them that they would cease to weep: but no, it is "going and weeping." A true heart that is coming to God takes the road by Weeping-Cross; it feels its sin, its guilt, its undesert, and it therefore mourns. The closet is sought out and prayer is offered; but in the supplication there is a dove's note, a moaning as of one sorrowing for love. When the prayer is over, there is a dissatisfaction with the prayer, a smiting on the breast, as much as to say, "I pray but coldly compared with the way in which I ought to pray."

Turning the text round, we read not only of "going and weeping," but also of weeping and going. The holy grief here intended does not lead to sitting still, for it is added "they shall go." When the prodigal cries, "I will arise and go to my Father," then a work of grace is certainly begun, but not till then. It is not enough to say, "I perish with hunger;" but when there follows upon it, "I will arise, and go to my Father, and will say unto Him, Father, I have sinned," then we have reached salvation has come to our house. True mourning for sin leads the sinner to the cross. When thou talkest about repentance, if thy repentance be with thy back to the cross, away with thy repentance. The way to repent is with your eye upon the sacrifice, viewing the flowing of the sin-atoning blood, marking every precious drop, gazing into the Redeemer's wounds, and believing in the love which in death opened up its depths unsearchable.

We must not pass over that last word, "They shall the Lord their God." This, dear hearer, shall be a guide to you as to whether your present state of feeling is leading you aright. What is it you are seeking? "I am seeking," says one, "I am seeking peace." May you soon obtain it, and may it be real peace; but I am not sure of you. "I am seeking," says another, "the pardon of sin." Again, I pray that you may find it; but I am not sure of you. If another shall reply, "I am seeking the Lord; for I desire above all things to have Him for a friend, though to Him I have been an enemy;" then I have good hope of Him. I rejoice over the heart which is crying, "I want to see my Father's face, and hear Him say, 'I have blotted out thy sins;' I want to dwell with God, to serve Him, to obey Him, to grow like Him. There has been a quarrel between Him and me, and other lords have had dominion over me, but now I desire that He shall be my Lord and King, and myself His loyal humble servant, and His beloved child. I hunger and thirst after God!"

You see, brethren and sisters, we require a great many things in order to be saved, and yet one thing is needful. I would represent it in this form: Here is a little child, picked up from the gutter, diseased and filthy, unclad, unfed; and if you ask me to make out a catalogue of what the child wants you must give me a sheet of foolscap paper to write it all down, and then I fear I shall leave out many things. I will tell you in one word what that poor infant requires—it wants its mother. If it gets its mother it has all it needs. So to tell what a poor sinner wants might be a long task; but when you say that he wants his heavenly Father you have said it all. This was what the prodigal needed, was it not? He needed his Father, and when he came to his Father all his necessities were supplied. O souls, you are seeking aright if you are seeking your God. Nothing short of this will suffice. This may greatly aid you to judge whether you are in the right way or no.

II. Secondly, these mourners became

INQUIRERS.

We read in the second verse of our text, "They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward." They knew something, that is clear, for they turned their faces in the right direction; but having been born and nurtured in Babylon, the road to Jerusalem had never been trodden by them, the route was strange and new. They knew within a little the quarter in which Zion lay, and they looked that way; but they did not know all about the road; how should they? The saving point about them was that they were not ashamed to confess their ignorance. Minds that the Lord has touched are never boastful of their wisdom. There are may persons in the world who would be converted if they could but consent to be taught by God's Word and Spirit; but they are such wise people, to enter the school of grace.

THEY KNOW TOO MUCH

It is clear from their asking their way that these inquirers were teachable. They not only yielded to be instructed, but they were eager to be taught; and therefore they asked for information. It is a hopeful sign when children ask questions; if we can get them to desire knowledge, the desire will be more valuable than the knowledge itself. The way nowadays is to cram the memory; but if our youths could be brought to hunger for knowledge, and to ask questions, their minds would be much more effectually benefited. It is a great mercy for a poor seeking sinner to have a teachable spirit, so as to pray, "Lord Jesus, write Thy Gospel upon my heart. Here it is, ready to be written on. Only tell me what Thou wouldst have me to do. I make no reservation—I am willing, by Thy help, to do it; or if there be nothing to be done but to sit at Thy feet, tell me that, and I will do this as Thy grace enables me."

At the same time, note concerning those that are coming to the Lord and His people, that they are questioning, but they are still resolved. They ask their way to Zion, but they have set their faces like flints in that direction. They ask how they can be right with God, not as a matter of curiosity, but because they mean to be at peace with Him; by God's grace nothing shall turn them aside from their God and His temple, and hence their anxiety to be surely right. They do not raise questions by way of quibbling that they may have an excuse for sitting still, but they question because they are in downright earnest. True penitents will have Christ or die. Therefore with solemn resolve, lest perchance they should be misled, they ask their way, determined to walk therein.

Though they ask the way, we may remark further that they know whither they are going. They ask their way to Zion. They wish to know how they can become fellow-citizens with the people of God, how they can behold the great sacrifice, how they can eat the true passover, how they can be accepted worshippers of Jehovah, and how they can enjoy fellowship with Him; they ask their way with understanding, for they know what their heart is seeking. They ask their way, not to somewhere or other, but to Zion; not to some imaginary blissful shore that may be or may not be, but they seek God's own dwelling-place, God's own palace, God's own sacrifice.

III. Now we come to the last matter; these inquirers become for they said one to another, "Come and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten." Oh, that word "covenant!" I can never pronounce it without joy in my heart. It is to me a mine of comfort, a mint of delight, a mass of joy. Time was when theology was full of covenant truth; nowadays these grand old doctrines are laid aside by our wise men as too commonplace for their enlightened minds. I do not believe that some modern preachers could say "covenant;" they could not frame to pronounce it aright. The doctrine of the "covenant" is a kind of shibboleth by which we may know the man of God from the false prophet.

We pray the Lord, "Give us this day our daily bread." How came it to be ours? Why, because it was guaranteed us in the covenant; covenant provision has made it ours, and therefore we may ask for it as ours. Have I any right to ask God for what is not mine in Christ Jesus? As sinners we sue for mercy and crave for the sake of grace; but when we come to be children, we can also appeal to other attributes, and especially to faithfulness, which is a great covenant security. We can now say, "My Father, since I am Thy child I am an heir of God, joint-heir with Jesus Christ; therefore give me of the fulness which Thou hast treasured up in Him on my behalf." The upper springs are ours, and the nether springs shall not be withheld.

"He who hath made my heaven secure
Will here all good provide.
Since Christ is rich, can I be poor?
What can I want beside?"

Returning to the text, from which I have diverged a little: these inquirers become covenanters, for we read that they seek to be joined unto the Lord—"Come and let us join ourselves to the Lord." The mischief of our fallen state arose from our trying to be distinct and independent of our God. The younger son said, "Give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." See, he has received his share in ready-money and off he goes to the far country. What does he do when he penitently returns? Why he joins himself to his Father. Nothing in the house is his, he has had his portion of goods long ago; but he lives at home because he is one with his Father, and cannot be shut out from the house of his Father. He is in communion with his Father, and so he is a partaker of all his Father's goods.

Next, notice for how long a time this covenant is to be made—"Let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant." In our English army of late they have enlisted

"SHORT TIME" MEN.

A good brother came to join the church last week who is in the Reserve, and I said to him, "You are not coming to unite with us for two sixes, the first six with the colors and the other six as a reserve man—you have come, I hope, to fight under the colors as long as life lasts." "Ay, sir," he said, "I give myself up to the Lord forever." No salvation is possible except that which saves the soul forever. It must be an everlasting salvation or no salvation. And yet some professors try to be off and on with God; they are wonderfully good on the Sabbath; but they slip their regimentals off on Sunday night, and there is no accounting for them during the week. I do not know where these double-faced people are to be found on a Monday night, but I fear they are up to no good. These chameleons change their color according to the light they are in. Their religion is a sort of play-acting, a kind of masquerade. Beware of a religion which you can put on and off.

In the Capitol at Rome I saw one of the Roman Emperors, and I remembered well his majesty's brutal countenance; soon after I saw the gentleman looking very different; I should not have recognized his imperial highness at all if it had not been for the name; the fact is, they had put another wig on him. Oddly enough, certain of those statues are so carved that a series of stone head-dresses can be put upon them; and this makes a mighty difference in their appearance. I am afraid that to some professors their religion is a wig, which so wonderfully changes them when they put it on or take it off, that you would not think they were the same people. A real man of God has his religion interwoven into the warp and woof of his being; he could not be other than he is whatever his circumstances might be.

Note, further, that this joining to God these covenanters intended to carry out in a most solemn way; "let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual"—agreement? or promise? No. "Covenant" is the word. It is a profitable thing for the soul to covenant with God. Dr. Doddridge gives a form of personal covenant in his "Rise and Progress," and I have been told that some persons have written it out and even signed it with their blood. I believe that such a formal transaction may lead a soul into bondage. This covenanting is not to be performed quite so literally, but that it should be done really I do believe. That a man should give himself to the Lord in set and solemn form at some time in his life I believe to be a great help to his after perseverance; and if he will renew his covenant every now and then it may greatly help to his keeping it.

to the Lord. They have said, "Lord, I do this day, as a poor sinner, solemnly put my trust in Thy Word, and in Thy Son, and in His atoning sacrifice; and, doing this, I feel that I am not my own, for I am bought with a price; and I now ask for grace that from this day forward I may be wholly Thine. Not only I, but my wife, and my children, and my substance, and all that I have I give to Thee, my Lord, admitting that nothing which I have was ever mine, but always Thine. I pray that Thou wilt be my God forever and ever, and be my guide even unto death, and that after death Thou wilt receive me to glory."

Such a covenant as this will bear to be looked back upon and repeated. You can gladly say—

"High heaven that heard my solemn vow,
That vow renewed shall daily hear,
Till in life's latest hour I bow,
And bless in death a bond so dear."

You are coming to the Lord rightly, my dear friend, if you are yielding body, soul, and spirit unto Him to be His forever. There is no fear about your safety when you join yourself unto the Lord by a perpetual covenant.

One word more remains to be spoken: those who came mourning and inquiring, when they became covenanters felt that they had a nature very apt to forgetfulness of good things, and so a part of what they desired in their covenanting with God was "a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten." God will never forget, yet may you pray, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy Kingdom." The fear is lest you should forget. What is your view of that possibility? Would it not be terrible? Let us therefore pray the Lord that it may be a perpetual covenant, that shall never, never, not even for an hour be forgotten.

Ask the Lord to write this covenant upon the fleshly tablets of your heart, that it may be there for ever. O Zion, if I forget thee may my right hand forget her cunning! Sooner than I should forget Thee, O my God, suffer me speedily to die! Let me not live to become so false, so wicked, as under stress of infirmity or temptation, even for a moment to turn aside from Thee! Beloved brother, take hold on Christ this morning with a renewed grip, and say, "Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee: suffer me not to forsake Thee. Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe. I would be Thine living, Thine dying, and Thine forever and ever." Thus desiring and pleading, all will be well with you. May the God of the everlasting covenant bless you. Amen.

RICHARD BAXTER ON THE BATTLE-FIELD.

IN the course of the war between Charles I., King of England, and his army, and the army of the Parliament under the Christian and patriotic general, Oliver Cromwell, the latter earnestly solicited Richard Baxter, the far-famed author of "The Saint's Everlasting Rest," to become one of his chaplains. Baxter, whose life was already crowded with the activities of holy service, could not at first see his way to comply with this request, but ultimately he left his charge at Kidderminster, and gave himself up to the duties of the chaplaincy. Though an extremely delicate man, his courage, amid the dangers of the field, was no whit behind that of the bravest of the brave. Our illustration represents him in the act of giving spiritual succor to one of the wounded Ironsides, and is a fitting illustration of the beneficence and usefulness of his whole life.

Richard Baxter was born at Burton, Shropshire, on November 12th, 1615. His father was one of the noble band of Puritans from whose numbers came the little group of heroes who sailed to this country in the Mayflower. He was educated at Ludlow, and took charge of the grammar school at Wroxeter for a short time. When about twenty years old he was supposed to be in a consumption. In 1634 he resided at court, in London, but was disgusted with its frivolities. He was at that time ordained, and spent the remainder of his life in service for Christ with tongue and pen. He was tried before the infamous Judge Jeffreys for preaching and writing Christian books, and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. He died on December 8th, 1691, soon after his release from prison, aged seventy-six.

PERIL OF A MISSIONARY'S FAMILY DURING A HURRICANE IN SAMOA.

THE Samoas are a volcanic group of islands in the Western Polynesia, about three thousand miles from Sydney, New South Wales. During the first three months of the year most violent hurricanes rage throughout Polynesia. Our picture depicts one of these visitations, which occurred at the Samoa group in January, 1865. The Rev. Martin Dyson, a missionary, resided with his family at the small island of Manono, and on Saturday, January 28th, a very severe hurricane swept over the place. It began to show signs of violence about noon, when one tree at the end of Mr. Dyson's house was torn partly up by its roots, and fell on the house. Mr. and Mrs. Dyson and their youngest child were in the room nearest to the falling tree at the time, and although it was fully expected that it would have crushed in upon the family, they were protected by the kind hand of God.

The branches prevented the heavy trunk from breaking through the wooden building. In falling, the tree tilted over, and leaned on the house, the top part, with its long branches and large leaves, covering the end of the building which was most exposed to the hurricane, which blew from the north. The elastic and small, but long and numerous, branches of the tree, falling on the end of the house and its roots on one side still retaining their hold upon the soil, the tree was thus prevented from being fully uprooted, and the full weight of the tree was also prevented from crushing in the rafters.

After detailing his escape, Mr Dyson says in a letter to a friend: "The hurricane increased in fury during the afternoon. Then, about nine o'clock in the evening, it suddenly ceased, and the wind veered round to just the opposite quarter, south-west, and recommenced blowing, though less violently, throughout the night. We were drenched with the rain, but 'by the good hand of our God upon us,' escaped without sustaining the slightest personal harm. I ascribe all to the care of God over us, for which, when I remember this occurrence, I ever give thanks."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Novel Device for Learning Lessons was adopted by a school girl in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. She endeavored during one evening to learn the lesson set her by her teacher, but failed, and retired to rest in despair. An hour or two afterward her mother, entering the child's bedroom, was surprised to see a paper lying on the head of the sleeping girl. Written upon it was the lesson that had given her so much trouble. She naïvely explained her idea afterward. She had written out the lesson and placed it carefully on her head before she went to sleep in the hope that "somehow it would get into her head" in the night. Older people laugh at such a device; they know lessons cannot be learned by contact. But they are not so wise in religious matters. Numbers of people seem to think that contact with God's people, association with a church and a scrupulous observance of sacraments and ceremonies will avail them, forgetting that Christ said "Ye must be born again" (Gal. 6 : 15).

The Victim of a Curious Superstition has Died in San Francisco. A Chinese woman was washing her feet in one of the houses in the Chinese quarter when she accidentally spilled some of the water on one of her own countrymen. It is believed by the Chinese that such an accident will bring misfortune to the person upon whom the water thus falls, and it becomes the duty of the careless person to present to the other a certain amount of candy and coin to avert the evil. The woman did as this strange superstition commanded, but the man was not satisfied, and threatened to shoot some one in the house. A few hours later he returned and deliberately shot the woman. Ignorance, superstition, and cruelty are inseparable companions, as the Scripture assures us (Psalms 74 : 20).

Why it was Decided not to Build a Hotel in a town in Georgia is explained by a local editor. A project was started to build a hotel, and a committee formed to solicit subscriptions. One gentleman to whom the committee applied was noted for his liberal hospitality and for his readiness to entertain strangers. His answer to the application was, "What do you want of a hotel here? Every respectable person who comes to town puts up with me and is welcome, and every disreputable person leaves town because he cannot put up anywhere." The committee regarded the existing arrangement as beneficial to the town, and it is stated that no hotel will be built. As a rule a traveller feels that his prospect of securing accommodation in a town where he is a stranger, depends rather on his possessing money than character, but it appears that there is at least one place where character is the indispensable requisite. If this hospitable gentleman were gifted with penetrating and unerring judgment, there are many people welcomed elsewhere who would do well to avoid being benighted in that town. A day is coming when a test will be applied to those who would enter into another guest chamber (Matt. 22 : 12).

The Remarkable History of a Treasured Coin has been related by its possessor. It is a five-dollar gold-piece, dated 1807. The present owner received it from a lady, in whose possession it has been since 1847, when it was bequeathed to her by her father, who died in that year. He had owned it since 1812. It came into his possession as his first earnings after he arrived in this country. He said while he lived "it should never be spent unless it had to go for bread." For sixty-nine years it has never been in circulation. The lady had intended to present it to her nephew, but he died last year, and she decided to invest it as part pay for a cradle inclosure for his grave. It is singular that a coin treasured so many years should, after all, have been used to pay for a tomb and not for bread. It is a coincidence that the first time we read in the Bible of money being used it was for the same purpose—to purchase a grave (Gen. 23 : 16).

THE CLERGYMAN'S INTERCESSION.

"I CONSIDER your conduct fraudulent; you have deceived us, and I believe you have done so wilfully. I shall advise the house to oppose any settlement of the debt under a hundred cents to the dollar." So spoke Mr. Henry Day, the junior partner in a large wholesale firm, to a poor, downcast, trembling man who stood on the opposite side of his desk.

"No, sir, no, do not say that," pleaded Mr. Long, the unhappy debtor. "I have deceived you, I know, but wilfully?—oh no, I was deceived myself. The statement of affairs I gave you a year ago I honestly believed to be correct. I had no idea that it could appear anything like it does in the accountant's figures."

"Ah! well," said Mr. Day, "it comes to the same thing; the statement you prepared was false, or you would not be obliged to suspend payment now. This practice is most injurious to business; it must be stopped. You ask us for credit and you tell us you are worth so much over and above your liabilities; a year afterward we find you have less than nothing. You have not lost it all in a year, I suppose? Your statement was false, sir, and fraudulent, and you ought to go to State's prison."

"But let me explain," interposed poor Long, his face burning with blushes.

"No, sir, I will listen to no explanation; the figures speak for themselves. You may consider us among the creditors who will vote against an arrangement."

The creditor turned away as he said so, and the debtor went to his home with a heavy heart. His wife opened the door to him, her face silently asking what success he had met with, and his face gave her silently the melancholy news. Their furniture must be sold, their paltry little treasures, prized for old association's sake far above their intrinsic value, must be knocked down at far less than their value, and they must be stripped of everything; and even then there would not be enough to satisfy the creditors. Gently and lovingly the wife put her hand in her husband's and led him into the dear old parlor where they had spent so many happy hours. Three little curly heads were bending over the table at their lessons, and three loving faces were raised for a kiss from papa, who to them was all that was good and honorable, whatever Mr. Day might say. Philip Long groaned as he thought of these children's future, and sitting down buried his face in his hands.

A few minutes later a hand was laid on his shoulder, and a sympathetic voice said, "I heard you were in trouble, my friend, and I thought I would come and offer you sympathy at any rate. I wish I could offer you more substantial help."

"Ah, Mr. Pearson, is it you? I am glad to see you," said Mr. Long, looking up and cheering under his pastor's friendly greeting.

"Can you tell me your trouble?" asked the kind clergyman. "Do not do so if it gives you pain. I am sure you have acted conscientiously. Let me pray with you. There is no comfort equal to that of carrying all trouble to God. Let us do as the disciples did—let us go and tell Jesus."

The broken-spirited man arose, and leaving his wife and children together, went with his minister into another room.

"The worst part of my trouble," he said, when they had sat down, "is that I have given cause to the world for suspicion. A creditor to-day told me I had been guilty of fraud."

"He had no ground for the charge, I am sure," said the clergyman.

"I am afraid he had, sir, from his standpoint. About a year ago he asked me, as the account grew larger, to furnish the house with a statement of my affairs. I did so. I placed to my credit all my stock at the price I paid for it, and all the money owing me, exactly as it stood on my books, and on the other side the account, all the money I owed. The balance to my credit was such that the house continued to give me credit. When I was obliged to suspend payment the creditors sent an accountant to prepare a statement of affairs. He valued the stock at its market-price, which was less than I had given for it. Many of the debts owing me he wrote off as bad, so decreasing one side the account, and on the other side there had been law expenses, arrears of interest, and other things which increased it, leaving the balance on the wrong side. His statement, therefore, when compared with mine, showed a glaring disparity. That was the reason Mr. Day charged me with deceiving them, and called my conduct fraudulent."

"I understand," said the minister. "You took a hopeful view of your position, and the accountant did not. Which do you consider correct?"

"In a sense they are both correct. If the goods were forced into the market they would not realize more than the accountant's valuation, but if I had an opportunity to sell them they would realize the value I set upon them. So, too, with the debts. If my debtors had time they would pay in full, but if they are pressed they cannot pay."

"Yes, I think I understand your position. Have you explained this to your creditors?"

"I tried to do so this afternoon, but Mr. Day would not listen to me. If I could have persuaded him to deal mercifully with me, I think, as he is the largest creditor, the others would have done so too."

"I am very sorry for that," Mr. Pearson said. "What a blessing it is that God never treats us so, but always listens to our cry. Let us tell Him about this matter."

Philip called his wife, and together they knelt, while their pastor besought the Friend of the poor to comfort and support them. Then with a few encouraging words he left them.

"I will go and see this Mr. Day," said the minister to himself, as he turned into the street. "I may perhaps, God helping me, do some good." He consulted a directory in the nearest drug-store, and was soon at Mr. Day's door.

Mr. Day was a bachelor, and the clergyman found him in cosey apartments comfortably ensconsed by an open fire, reading, and smoking a favorite meerschaum. He had risen from poverty, and still in private indulged in a pipe, though in company he smoked cigars as his friends did. He received Mr. Pearson courteously, but when he learned the good clergyman's errand his brow clouded. But he listened patiently, continuing to smoke, as with some considerable tact the minister tried to remove the misunderstanding about the wilfulness of the deceit.

"Excuse me, sir," said Mr. Day, "you are not a business man, and do not see this conduct in its right light. Wholesale houses are continually being deceived in this way. We must protect ourselves against these false balance-sheets, and this man ought to be made an example of. I am aware that a man in difficulties naturally tries to encourage himself by taking a hopeful view of the situation, but he ought to have more courage. Long probably did deceive himself, as you say. Perhaps I was a little hasty in charging him with fraud. But still it is clear he deceived us, and as a business man I consider him culpable. You, as a clergyman, see things from a different standpoint."

"I hope," said Mr. Pearson, "we have the same standard of morality, but, as you say, in a question of mercy or justice perhaps I have a different standpoint from yours. May I describe mine?"

"With pleasure, sir. I shall be glad to know how you regard these business matters which I think you cannot understand."

"I regard them in the light of our relations to God," said Mr. Pearson. "The best among us is but a bankrupt debtor before Him. We have miserably failed in our duty, and our only hope is in His mercy freely offered through Jesus. We may well show the mercy to others we desire for ourselves. The prayer we are taught at our mothers' knee inculcates that duty."

The words touched a tender memory in Mr. Day's heart, probably the only tender one there. "I had a pious mother, sir; I know well the prayer to which you allude. I have forgotten most of her teaching, but I remember that. I have often wished I could realize the peace she had. The cares and anxieties of business make one careless of such matters. But your words carry my mind back to the old longing like the chords of a familiar tune. Is it possible without cant and without humbug to look forward to the future beyond the grave without terror?"

Philip Long's troubles were forgotten as Mr. Pearson explained to the hard business man the plan of salvation, and pointed him to the cross which had supported the faith of the mother long dead but not forgotten. The hours passed away while this conversation went on, and at last Mr. Day begged the minister to pray with him that God would have mercy upon him. Mr. Pearson gladly consented, and when he took his departure he left his newly-made friend holding feebly but hopefully to the light revealed. Mr. Day's last words were: "Please ask Mr. Long to come and see me again in the morning. We will see what can be done for him. If he is an honest man he shall have a chance of paying his debts in full, if a little time and a little additional capital can do it. I owe him more than that for the blessing he has been the means of sending to me to-night.

It was a joyful errand that took Mr. Pearson to the house of distress late that night, and it diffused sunshine in anxious, troubled hearts. Philip Long had his "chance," and proved himself worthy of it. He has long since discharged all his liabilities, and is honored and respected by all who know him, not least by the wealthy merchant, who dates his new life from the hour of Philip Long's gloomiest experience.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Easy Path Downward.

THE prison was not the one from which David had just been released; but there was a mournful sameness to it. He did not feel like a stranger there. He had had one night free—a night and day with his dying mother; and now three more months stretched before him. But this time he was sullen and moody, brooding over his injuries. There was no longer the hope to sustain him of learning a trade, by which he could maintain his mother and Bess. He felt sure his mother would be dead before this second term was over, and it would be best for little Bess to have nothing to do with a brother who had been twice in jail.

David became insolent and refractory. What did it matter if they put him into the black hole, where no single ray of light could enter? The darkness could not affright him; or, if it did, he would harden himself against it, as he hardened himself against every punishment or expostulation. He could not put his wretchedness into words; you might as well ask of him to paint on canvas a picture of his prison-cell. His tongue was dumb; but his memory and the passion of his heart were never silent. They were forever muttering to him in undertones of revenge and hatred and defiance.

David completed his fourteenth year in jail. The heavy-browed, sullen-faced boy, who was discharged from his second imprisonment in April, could hardly have been recognized as the lad who had gone out, ashamed though resolute, to beg for help the preceding October. He slouched along the sunny streets, under the blue sky, bright with glistening spring clouds; but he paid no heed to sunshine or cloud.

In old times there had been the changes of the seasons even for him and little Bess in their squalid street; but they had no more power over his sullen moods. He sauntered on, not homeward (he knew too well there could be no home for him), but toward the old familiar place, the only spot he knew well on earth, where, at least, he would find faces not altogether strange to him, if they were not the faces of friends, and where alone he could learn any tidings of Bess. But he did not hurry; there was no mother now to be hungry for a sight of him.

Still, when he reached the house, he went straight to the old door, and knocked. A stranger opened it, and looked suspiciously at him. There was no Mrs. Fell there. She had never heard of such a person. She had only come into the house three weeks ago, and she was too busy getting her own living to go gossiping among the neighbors. She slammed the door to in his face, and he heard her draw the bolt on the inside. He had not caught even a glimpse of the poor, dark room, which had once been his home.

"I'll go upstairs, and ask Victoria," said David to himself.

He mounted the stairs slowly and quietly, not with the buoyant step of an active and restless lad, but with the hesitating, listless tread of a culprit. He was ashamed of facing either Euclid or Victoria, and he was almost afraid that their door would be shut in his face. But when he reached the foot of the last staircase, leading only to their garret, he saw the door open, and he mounted more quickly.

Yes, the door was open, propped open with a brick, to prevent it from banging to and fro on its hinges; but the garret was quite empty. There was no trace left of its former tenants, except the pictures which Victoria had pasted over the fireplace. All was gone—the broken chair, the corner cupboard, the poor flock-bed from the floor, the black kettle, and little brown teapot; there was nothing left. David sat down in the corner where Victoria's bed had been, and hid his face in his hands. If there had been a faint hope left in his heart of finding friends and a refuge here, the glimmer of it died away into utter darkness. He was absolutely alone in the world which had been so cruel to him.

It is possible that he fell asleep for very sorrow; but after a long while, as the dusk of evening was creeping on, he roused himself, and slowly descended the stairs. On the second floor he tapped with a trembling hand on a closed door, and quietly lifted the latch. He knew the workman who lived there with his wife and children. They were sitting at supper; and the man, calling out, "Who's there?" looked up, as David put his pale face round the door.

"I'm looking for my mother!" he said, in a faltering voice.

"Your mother!" repeated the man, rising angrily. "I know what you want, you jail-bird! Get out o' this at once, you skulking thief!"

But David did not wait for him to reach the door. He closed it hastily, and ran down-stairs to escape if he was pursued. As he was passing into the street, he heard his name called through Blackett's open door. He stopped instantaneously, catching at a straw of hope. Perhaps Roger could tell him what had become of Bess.

"Come in, David Fell," called the voice of Blackett himself, "come in! Now you're tarred with the same stick as my lads, you needn't stand off from me no more. You and me'll be as thick as thieves now. Come in, my lad," he added in as kindly a tone as he could assume. "I'm right sorry for thee, and I've news for thee."

For a moment David hesitated, remembering his mother's dread of her neighbor; but Blackett came to the door, and dragged him in, in no way roughly.

"You've come to look after your poor mother?" he said gravely.

David nodded.

"She's dead—died the very night after you was booked for another three months," said Blackett.

David did not speak. No change passed over his hard and sullen face. He had known it all the while in the dreary solitude of his prison-cell. He would never see his mother's face again—never! Yet, as he stood there opposite to Blackett, he felt as if he could see her lying in the room beyond on the sacking of her comfortless bed, with her white face and hungry eyes turned toward the door, watching for him to come in.

"And Bess is gone away—nobody knows where," continued Blackett, eyeing the boy with a keen, sinister gaze, "on the streets somewhere. There's not much chance for Bess, neither."

David flinched and shivered. Should he ever see little Bess again? Never again as he had been used to see her. He could recollect all his life through having her given into his care and keeping—a younger, smaller, feebler creature, dependent upon him. He had played with her, and fought for her. They had eaten and been hungry together, and had had every event of their lives in common, until he was sent to jail. Was little Bess likely to be sent to jail too? Girls as young as Bess were sent to prison; and the chances were all against her keeping out of it.

"Queen Victoria and my Lord Euclid are gone," went on Blackett, with a sneer. "They made a moonlight flit of it, and they hadn't the manners to leave their address behind 'em. They carried all their fortune with them."

Still David did not speak, but stood looking into Blackett's face, with a forlorn and listless strangeness, which touched even him with its utter loss of hope.

"Come, come, my lad! never say die!" he exclaimed. "Take a drop out o' my glass here, and pluck up your spirits. Take a good pull at it, David. You haven't asked after Roger. He's in better luck than you. He cribbed a parcel of money from under Victoria's pillow, and my Lord Euclid had him took up for it. I was always in hopes of gettin' him off my hands, the poor hang-dog! But he had grand luck. Old Euclid sets to and pleads for him to the justice; and they found out as it was a sin and a shame to send a lad like him to jail—a lad o' fourteen! And they've sent him to school!—to school, David, where he's quite the gentleman!"

But here David broke into a loud and very bitter cry. Why had they not done the same with him? Oh, why had they committed him to jail, and sent Roger to school? He hid his face in his hands, and hot tears of anger and despair rolled down his cheeks.

"They've made an order on me for half a crown a week," continued Blackett, after a pause. "I've paid it six weeks, and now I'm giving 'em the slip. I'm a-going to cross the river into Surrey to-night; and, if you'll come along with me, I'll say you are my son, and I'll pay your lodgin' to-night. An old neighbor's son sha'n't sleep in the streets. Come, David! You haven't got another friend in this place; and I don't ask you to be a thief. You shall get your livin' quite honest, if you can. You're not a lazy hound like Roger, or I'd have nought to say to you. But you'll always be worth your bread and cheese, if you can get work. Come, and we'll get supper at the tavern afore we start."

"I'll come," said David. At the word "supper" he felt how hungry he was; and he remembered that he was penniless. Blackett had already disposed of his few possessions to the tenant who had taken his room; so there was nothing now to be done but to pick up his bundle of clothes, and his glazier's tools, and, as it was already night, to take his departure across the river, where he was as yet unknown by sight to the police. David Fell followed him as his only friend.

Blackett was as good as his word. He did not in any way interfere with David's efforts to obtain work by which he could live honestly. He counted surely upon what the result would be; and, when he saw David start off morning after morning on his fruitless search, he would thrust his tongue into his cheek, and chuckle scornfully, causing the lad's heavy heart to sink yet lower. But no one else was kind to him; and, though he had a lurking dread and distrust of Blackett, there was no one else to give him a morsel of food. Blackett gave him both food and shelter, and of an evening he took him with him to the haunts of men like himself; and among them David perfected the lessons he had begun to learn in jail.

The brave spirit of the boy was broken; his powers of endurance were gone. He could no longer bear the gnawings of hunger and the cravings of thirst, as he had done as long as he could hold up his head before any one of his fellow-men. He felt compelled to slink away from the eye of a policeman, fancying that all the force knew him. And he had indeed the indelible brand of the prison-house upon him. He had a sullen, hang-dog expression; a skulking, cowardly gait; an alarmed eye, and restless glance, looking out for objects of dread. When he was hungry—and how often that was!—he no longer hesitated to snatch a slice of fish or a bunch of carrots from a street-stall, if he had a good chance of escape. To march whistling along the streets, with his head well up and his step free, was a thing altogether of the past now.

He made no effort to find Bess. If there had been any faint, forlorn hope in his heart, when he left jail, of still doing something better than drifting back into it, it had died away entirely before he had been a fortnight with Blackett. The courage he had once had was transformed into a reckless defiance of the laws and the society that had dealt so cruelly with him. What did he owe to society? Why should he keep its laws? He soon learned to say that his consent had not been asked when they were made; and why should he be bound by them? A rich man's son had all his heart could desire, and might break many of the laws of the land, because he could afford to pay a fine for it; while he, David Fell, left by society to live in degradation and forced idleness, was hurried off to prison for innocent offences such as his had been. A strong sense of injury and injustice smouldered in his boyish heart.

Summer came and went; and a second winter dragged down the poor again to their yearly depths of suffering and privation. David was in jail once more, this time for theft, at which he laughed. Prison was a comfortable shelter from the cold and hunger of the dreary mid-winter; and, if he had only luck enough to keep out of it in the summer, it was not bad for winter quarters. He learned more lessons in shoemaking, by which he could not get an honest living outside the jail-walls among honest folk. The time for that was past. He did not try to find work when he was free again. Henceforth the work David's hands would find to do was what God's law as well as man's law, call crime. But whose fault was it?

Nearly a year and a half had passed since Euclid and Victoria and Bess had found a home with Mrs. Linnett; and, though Mr. Dudley had done all in his power to discover David, every effort had failed. One July evening Bess was crossing London Bridge. The light from the setting sun shone upon the river, which was rippling in calm, quiet lines, with the peaceful flowing-in of the tide. Bess stood still for a few minutes, gazing westward to the golden sky. She was a prettier girl than even her own mother had thought sadly of her becoming; but this evening her face was brighter than usual. Her eyes sparkled, and her lips half parted with a smile, as her thoughts dwelt on some pleasant subject apart from the beauty of the sunset. She took no notice of the loungers on each side of her, who, like herself, were leaning over the parapet of the bridge, and gazing down on the river. But, as she roused herself from her pleasant girlish revery, and turned away to go on homeward, a hand was laid on her arm, and a voice beside her said in a low tone, "Bess!"
